Mr. SHERMAN. I move to amend the amendment by inserting in lieu of it the words "and not less than the market value" at the place I have indicated on the paper which I send to the desk. That will accomplish the object of the House. The language inserted in the House is in the wrong place. The bill simply authorizes the transfer of mint bars from the bullion fund of the assay office to the assistant treasurer at New York. It has passed the Senate already.

Mr. SARGENT. What difference does it make about the market value?

Mr. SHERMAN. The House, probably by inadvertence, have introduced those words at the wrong place, and I want them inserted at the proper place.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was concurred in.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3168) making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on Commerce was on page 4, after line 75, to insert:

For removing bowlders and rock from the Detroit River, partly in Canadian waters, $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was on page 5, in line 97, to insert after the words "Dunkirk, New York," the words "and Erie, Pennsylvania."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT. I wish to add at the end of that line an amendment in accordance with the recommendation of the Department, and one to which I presume there will be no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the Chair will receive the amendment now, though the usual course is to go through with the amendments reported by the committee. The Clerk will read the amendment proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The CHIEF CLERK. The proposed amendment is to insert after the word "dollars" in line 98 the words "of which not less than $20,000 shall be expended at Erie;" so as to make the clause read:

For continuing the improvement of the harbor at Dunkirk, New York, and Erie, Pennsylvania, $35,000; of which not less than $20,000 shall be expended at Erie.

Mr. CHANDLER. There is no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was in line 124, after the words "Saint Anthony," to insert the words "and for the improvement of the Mississippi River above the Falls of Saint Anthony;" so that the clause will read:

For continuing the improvement of the Falls of Saint Anthony, and for the improvement of the Mississippi River above the Falls of Saint Anthony, Minnesota, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 127, to strike out after the word "for" the word "continuing," and after the word "the" in the same line to insert the words "survey or;" so that the clause will read:

For the survey or improvement of the Minnesota River, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 130, to strike out after the word "river" the words "including repair of United States steamer Search, so that the clause will read:

For continuing the improvement of the Upper Mississippi River, $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out in lines 141 and 142 the following clause:

For continuing the improvement of the White River above Jacksonport, $50,000.

Mr. CLAYTON. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Commerce what reasons governed the committee in moving to strike out this appropriation?

Mr. CHANDLER. I will give the reason. In the estimates of the board of engineers will be found this:

No work has been done under this appropriation—

The appropriation of $50,000 made last year—

No work has been done under this appropriation beyond fitting a boat for service in those streams during the coming season.

Only snagging operations are contemplated. The appropriation will allow of five months' work, of which I propose to expend three in the White River, below Jacksonport, and two in the Saint Francis, below Wittsburgh.

The report shows $46,568 on hand of last year's appropriation, and as nothing but snagging is contemplated by the board of engineers, the committee deemed that fully sufficient for one year.

Mr. CLAYTON. We have in the State of Arkansas three thousand five hundred miles of navigable water, and with the exception of the small appropriation made for the Mississippi and Arkansas Rivers, most of which is made for the Mississippi River, if the recommendation of the committee be adopted not one cent will be appropriated toward rendering available those natural highways of thirty-five hundred miles in extent. I see from the report of General Humphreys that he recommends this appropriation of $50,000 for the White and Saint Francis Rivers. I find that the chairman of the Committee on Commerce proposes to strike out this $50,000, taking away from the State of Arkansas every cent of appropriation, with the exception that I have spoken of heretofore, and I find in looking over the amendments of the committee that for the Detroit River $25,000 is appropriated. I have no objection to that appropriation being made, and I voted for it just now; but I do object to robbing poor Arkansas Peter to pay rich Michigan Paul.

A great deal has been said about cheap transportation; propositions are on foot now to expend tens of millions, perhaps hundreds of millions toward creating artificial means of transportation. It seems to me that it would be a wiser policy on our part to expend a few thousand dollars yearly, as we have been in the habit of doing, toward rendering available the means of transportation that nature has so admirably adapted to the commerce of this country. I do hope that the Senate will stand by me in this little appropriation of $50,000 for thirty-five hundred miles of navigable water.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will say that there are very large appropriations in this bill for the Arkansas and other rivers; but this river, where it is simply proposed to use a snag-boat, some three hundred miles above where it unites with the Arkansas, is a small stream, and there are no reports as to the commerce of the river, and there being $46,568.39 on hand for snagging purposes the committee thought it was sufficient for this year.

I will state, furthermore, that of the $4,500,000 appropriated in this bill there are something over $2,000,000 for the Mississippi River and it branches. All the watershed of the Mississippi Valley is interested in the whole of that $2,000,000. The committee has tried to so apportion it as to do the most good to the commerce of that great region.

Mr. CLAYTON. The large appropriation that the Senator speaks of as being made for the improvement of the Arkansas River is this:

For continuing the improvement of the Mississippi, Missouri, and Arkansas Rivers, $100,000.

Mr. CHANDLER. There is likewise an appropriation for the Red River raft.

Mr. CLAYTON. That is not in Arkansas at all; it is in the States of Louisiana and Texas. A small portion of it touches the southern boundary of Arkansas, but a very small portion. The only appropriation you have now made for the State of Arkansas is $100,000, which is to be applied for the Missouri, the Mississippi, and the Arkansas Rivers. I should like to know how much the river Arkansas will get after the Missouri and Mississippi Rivers have been provided for.

Mr. DAVIS. In my opinion this appropriation of $50,000 ought not to be stricken out. I have looked over this bill with some care, and I find that the $50,000 appropriated here is the only amount allotted to Arkansas, and by a little further inspection I find that Michigan—I refer to her as she has been spoken of—has $475,000 in this bill and $25,000 of that has been added since the bill came from the House. This is about the usual proportion. I think the figures will bear me out in saying that since the war about one-tenth, perhaps one-ninth of the entire appropriations for rivers and harbors has been given to one State on the lakes. Without stating it as a fact, I think the figures are pretty nearly what I stated when I assert that two States lying in the Northwest have got more from the public Treasury in the shape of river and harbor appropriations than the thirteen or fourteen States south of the Potomac. I think that is the fact.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. DAVIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHANDLER. The State of Michigan happens to have a larger coast line than any other State in the Union, and along that coast line more than one thousand millions of commerce pass annually. It is true that there are $475,000 appropriated in this bill to those waters surrounding the State of Michigan. She is a peninsula with thirteen hundred miles of coast line. We cannot pass a river and harbor bill as a matter of course without having the appropriations for Michigan brought up, and I had some idea of commencing the consideration of this bill by reading about thirteen speeches that have been made in the last thirteen years calling attention to the appropriations for Michigan, and then reading one of my old speeches that I have made thirteen times in reply to them, which will answer just as well.

The Committee on Commerce pays no attention to State lines. Its duty is to appropriate for the commerce of the nation regardless of State lines, and it has endeavored to do it. Allusion has been made to the committee putting on $25,000 for the mouth of the Detroit River. There is more than twelve millions of commerce passing that very point in seven months in the year, or two millions a month substantially. Michigan did not ask for that appropriation; it was asked for by every board of trade in the United States, from Boston to Philadelphia and Saint Louis. Pennsylvania, New York, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, all have ten times the interest in these appropriations that Michigan has. Why, Mr. President, Michigan has five parallel lines of railroad, all coming in below the Saint Clair flats, running through from lake to lake substantially completed, and the commerce of Michigan goes by rail to Detroit, and there is only $25,000 here for the benefit of that great commerce.

Mr. CLAYTON. I should like to ask the Senator whether the Engineer Department has recommended that appropriation?

Mr. CHANDLER. Which appropriation?

Mr. CLAYTON. For the Detroit River.

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly they have.

Mr. CLAYTON. I do not see it in General Humphreys' recommendation.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have it here.

Mr. CLAYTON. I have looked carefully over his recommendations and have not been able to discover it; but I voted for that.

Mr. CHANDLER. There were eight wrecks there last year. This is simply to remove bowlders that have laid there since the glacial period; and by deepening the channel across the Saint Clair flats we have enabled them now to put on two thousand ton ships, and those two thousand ton ships touch these bowlders and there were eight wrecks and a loss of $178,000 last year alone. Now suppose you had a wreck or a rock discovered in New York harbor, how long would it be before there would be an appropriation put through here in post-haste to remove it? And yet there is more commerce passing that point during seven months in the year than there is in and out of the harbor of New York.

Mr. HAGER. Mr. President——

Mr. DAVIS. I gave way to the Senator from Michigan for a question. I have not heard the question yet.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia retains the floor.

Mr. DAVIS. I gave way to the Senator from Michigan for a question, but I have not heard it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I did not get up to ask a question. I answered one.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator from Michigan has thought proper to say that the Committee on Commerce ignore State lines entirely. I fully agree with him in that respect. I think they have done so, as a rule, for a couple of States up North appear to get all and other States not a dollar.

Arkansas, as I understand, has as much navigable water as perhaps any State in the Union, more I am told than any other; and yet there is but $50,000 appropriated to that State; she has hitherto got comparatively nothing; and even that $50,000 is proposed to be stricken out by the committee, and $25,000 of that sum—I presume it is of that sum, but certainly $25,000—is transferred to the State of Michigan, when previous to that as the bill came from the House she had $450,000, or about one-ninth of this whole bill.

My impression is that it would be unjust, unfair, and unstatesmanlike to strike out this $50,000 appropriated to the Arkansas River. We all know it ought to be double or three times that in comparison with what a portion of the rivers in the Northwest received. It is a fact I believe that the Northwest, though they may have a great deal of commerce—that I say nothing about—have a large amount of appropriations, while there is an equal amount of commerce in other places that in this bill have nothing. Take the State of Missouri, for instance; $25,000 was appropriated by the House in this bill for that State, and only $25,000. That was the only appropriation affecting the State of Missouri, and yet it has been struck out by the Committee on Commerce. When the amounts were read in the bill for the States in the Northwest, including Michigan, nothing was said by any one on this side of the House; we were all willing to be liberal; but we believe it is right and just that an equally liberal spirit should meet the South and Southwest as is exhibited to the Northwest.

Mr. WINDOM. I desire to ask the Senator from Arkansas whether the amount appropriated by the House is the amount in the reduced estimates of the Department?

Mr. CLAYTON. It is the amount called for in the estimates for the White and Saint Francis Rivers.

Mr. WINDOM. Then I shall favor the proposition of the Senator from Arkansas. At the opening of this session of Congress, as will be remembered, the Departments were all requested to reduce their estimates. They revised them carefully; and in presenting these reduced estimates it is fair to presume that those officers of the Government who know best what the wants of certain localities are and the necessities of certain improvements have reduced them as low as they could consistently with the public service. In fact, I know the letter of the Engineer-in-Chief transmitting these reduced estimates to Congress says specifically that he has kept that fact in view and has reduced them as low as he could without detriment to the public service. Believing that to be true, I shall sustain this appropriation.

I want to say further, while on this subject and on the floor, that there is no bill which will be brought before the Senate about which I propose to be so liberal in appropriations as this bill, for the reason that there is no other bill brought before Congress that leaves behind it, to show for the appropriations made, substantial benefits to business interests of this country; at least none that can be compared with this. And yet I think it is true, Mr. President, that for the last ten years no bill has been brought before Congress about which there has been so much criticism—I was going to use the term "penurious higgling," but I will not use it—about which there has been so much criticism as this bill. You bring in the sundry civil appropriation bill which passed the House recently, which appropriates $600,000 for the survey of the coast around this country—proper enough; I do not object to it—but when that $600,000 appropriation is discussed here, you will probably find no objection to it whatever. The same bill appropriates $750,000 for a public building in one place and a million and a half for public buildings in another place; but when we propose to appropriate $50,000 to benefit the section of country represented by my friend from Arkansas we stand here and discuss it, seeking to strike it down, finding fault with loading the bill, and all that.

Mr. President, I am in favor of putting upon this bill whatever is necessary for the business interests of the country. It leaves behind it something to show for the appropriation. When you appropriate money to pay salaries, or for nearly every other object that we appropriate money for in the Senate, it passes away with the end of the year and leaves nothing behind to benefit anybody. This is the people's bill for the people's interest, and to benefit commerce in this country, and on it I am willing to stand for all proper appropriations recommended by the Departments, especially when they have been called upon to revise and reduce their estimates and they say they cannot bring them below a certain point without detriment to the public service, as I believe is the case with my friend's proposition.

Mr. SPENCER. Being a member of the Committee on Commerce, I wish to say that I endeavored in the committee to have the Ouachita River substituted for the White River. The White River above Jacksonport is an unimportant stream; the country is sparsely settled; there is no commerce there, and very little use for the appropriation. I would say to the Senator from Minnesota that the revised estimates of the engineers do not recommend such improvements as these as necessary. I am sorry to see the appropriation for Arkansas stricken out, and I endeavored in the committee to stop it; but I sought to substitute the Ouachita River for the White River. The Ouachita River drains a rich alluvial country, and its improvement would benefit commerce. There is no necessity for this improvement of the White River above Jacksonport.

Mr. BOGY. I will not detain the Senate on this matter beyond the statement of a fact. I hope this appropriation will not be taken away from the State of Arkansas. White River can be made navigable for a large portion of the year with a small annual improvement. It drains all Northern Arkansas, flowing in a westerly direction along the northern line of the State of Arkansas and not far from the southern line of the State of Missouri, and it is a most important stream and the only outlet for that portion of Arkansas. It drains some ten or twelve of the finest counties of that State, counties that are improving in population every day, a fine cotton region; and it is the only means by which that portion of the country, Northern Arkansas and Southern Missouri, can get to market except by the old way, with mules and horses. If this river is not improved by a small annual improvement it becomes unnavigable on account of logs and driftwood brought down every spring.

In the revised estimates the sum of $50,000 is recommended for this improvement. In the original estimates the some of $64,000 was recommended, but in the revised estimates made in December, 1873, sent to Congress in January, 1874, under the resolution of the House of December 7, 1873, the sum of $50,000 is recommended as the amount necessary for that river. If we are to take anything as our guide in these appropriations, it does seem to me that these estimates are the best guide. I do hope this small appropriation will be retained, because I know it is important and without it that river is unnavigable for this year.

Mr. CHANDLER. Last year the Committee on Commerce put in a clause requiring the engineers in making surveys to give the statistics of commerce of all the harbors and rivers where appropriations were made, and in nearly all cases those statistics of commerce are given. They were required to do the same in regard to White River, but there are no statistics of the commerce of White River given. As there was $46,568 on hand, the committee thought it was as well for them to expend that $46,568, and return the statistics of the commerce of the river in their annual report. In almost every instance the statistics of commerce are given where any appropriation has been made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Commerce striking out the clause.

Mr. CLAYTON. I suppose the vote "no" on this will be to retain the appropriation.

Mr. SCHURZ. That is understood.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Those voting "ay" vote to strike out the appropriation.

The amendment was rejected; there being on a division—ayes 16, noes 30.

The next amendment reported by the Committee on Commerce was to strike out lines 143 and 144, as follows:

For continuing the improvement of the Osage River, Missouri, $25,000.

Mr. SCHURZ. I hope the Senate will not agree to this amendment. Much that has been said about the White River is applicable to the Osage River; and also the report of the engineer shows that the amount required in addition to the balance left of the last appropriation was $125,000. The revised estimates show that the board of engineers ask for the appropriation made here and now moved to be stricken out by the Committee on Commerce.

The question may be asked what is the commerce of the Osage River; and I suppose the committee had no statistics about that very likely. I can inform the committee that there is a very extensive mining industry springing up on the banks of that river which absolutely requires for the transportation of its products the improvement of the river.

The improvement has been commenced, and I think it is a matter of experience that when improvements are commenced and are interrupted then the good that has been achieved by the expenditure of the money is lost by the parsimonious refusal of the amount required to complete them. I hope, therefore, that the Senate will not agree to the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. CHANDLER. The same remarks which were made about White River will apply to this. I have no further remark to make.

Mr. BOGY. I will only state that this $25,000 is recommended in the revised estimates. The same amount was appropriated last year. The total amount recommended for this river was $125,000, which would effect the entire improvement of the Osage River, a river which is navigable for two hundred and fifty miles and requires but a small improvement. This sum is recommended in the revised estimates and is the only sum appropriated for the improvement of any rivers in the State of Missouri except the Missouri River itself and the Mississippi. I do hope the amendment will not be sustained.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was in the appropriation for continuing the improvement of the Mississippi River between the mouths of the Ohio and Missouri Rivers, in line 146, to strike out "Missouri" and insert "Illinois," and after the word "dollars," in line 147, to insert the words "and $15,000 of said amount shall be expended between the mouths of the Missouri and Illinois Rivers."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line 184 to insert the following clause:

For removing obstructions in the Choctawhatchie River, Alabama and Florida, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line 190 to insert the following clause:

For the improvement of the Chattahoochee and Flint Rivers, Georgia, $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line 196 to insert the following clause:

For the improvement of the Apalachicola River, Florida, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line 200 to insert the following clause:

For the improvement of Chester River, at Kent Island Narrows, Maryland, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line 204 to insert the following clause:

For the improvement of Elk River, Maryland, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I desire to offer an amendment to the clause in regard to continuing the improvement of the James River; but I presume I had better let the committee's amendments be first acted upon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments of the committee will be acted upon first.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was after line 229 to insert the following clause:

For the removal of obstructions in the harbor and the construction of a pier at New Castle, Delaware, $10,000,

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line 234 to insert the following clause:

For continuing United States pier in Delaware Bay, near Lewes, Delaware, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 249 to strike out the words "and Harlem Rivers" and to insert the word "river;" so that the clause will read:

For continuing the improvement by removing obstructions in the East River, at or near Hell Gate, $225,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line 256 to insert the following clause:

For the improvement of the harbor at Fall River, Massachusetts, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 262 to increase the appropriation for continuing the improvement of the harbor at Newport, Rhode Island, from $5,000 to $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line 276 to insert the following clause:

For the improvement of the harbor at Milford, Connecticut, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Chief Clerk continued the reading of the bill down to and read the following clause:

For removing wrecks and rocks off the harbor of San Francisco, California, $25,000.

Mr. SARGENT. I wish to offer an amendment at this point. Is it by order of the Senate that the amendments of the committee are first acted on?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the practice of the Senate.

Mr. SARGENT. I believe it is in order for me to offer an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has been the custom of the Senate to act on the committee's amendments first and take up other amendments afterward.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to offer an amendment to the first section, but I will reserve it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will have an opportunity after the committee's amendments are acted upon.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was in lines 319 and 320 to strike out the words "for examinations and surveys of rivers and harbors, and," and in line 321 to strike out "$75,000" and insert "$25,000;" so as to make the clause read:

For incidental repairs of harbors for which there is no special appropriation, $25,000.

Mr. DAVIS. That amendment strikes out all the surveys that are contained in the bill. The bill as it came from the House appropriated $75,000 for the examination and survey of different rivers and harbors. The committee propose to reduce the appropriation to $25,000 instead of $75,000 as it is now. If the amendment prevails, no other surveys will be ordered.

Mr. SARGENT. Then they strike out the whole of the second section providing for examinations and surveys.

Mr. DAVIS. I understand that. I have stated the effect of the pending amendment, but as there was a good deal of noise in the Chamber, perhaps I was not heard. I see the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHANDLER] hold his hand to his ear as if he wanted to hear what I have to say, and I wish him to hear me.

The pending amendment proposes to reduce the appropriation for examinations and surveys of rivers and harbors from $75,000 to $25,000. This is followed by an amendment striking out the second section, which contains all the surveys ordered by the House. Some of them perhaps may be unnecessary; that I know nothing of; but in that section there are some very important surveys provided for, surveys which I know personally are of the highest importance. The result will be to prevent all surveys of rivers and harbors. It is a blow at the whole system. Further than that, as I understand, appropriations hereafter can only be made after surveys by the Government, and if we make no surveys, no appropriations can be made hereafter. I believe I am right in that. The surveys of the Northwest, and perhaps of the North and much of the other portions of the country, have already been made. Unless these surveys are ordered, many of which are of important rivers, although some of them may be unimportant, no appropriation can be had in the future for them. I therefore hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. There are a very large number of surveys in the second section, unquestionably some of them very important, and others unimportant. The House will undoubtedly non-concur in our amendments and ask for a committee of conference, and in that committee of conference the more important surveys will no doubt be retained. Heretofore we have ordered some surveys which ought never to have been made, surveys of small creeks and small streams. In one instance, I think, we ordered the survey of a creek that had but eight inches of water and was about eight feet wide. It was simply ridiculous. Nobody knew anything about it; but it was inserted, and the Government engineers went to survey this little creek with about eight inches of water and eight feet wide. If the Senate shall see fit to stand by the committee in its recommendations the more important surveys, surveys that are really important, will undoubtedly be put in by a committee of conference. If the Senator has any surveys he desires to have made I will accept them before the section is stricken out, which will bring them before the committee of conference.

Mr. RAMSEY. Will the Senator then accept an amendment on page 15, after line 22, to insert "Red River of the North from Breckenridge to Moorhead?" I will furnish it to the Senator.

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly, I will accept that.

Mr. HAGER. Will the Senator accept an amendment for the Sacramento and Feather Rivers, in California?

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly, if the Senator will prepare it.

Mr. HAGER. It will be found in lines 31 and 32 of the second section.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Kentucky had a survey that he desired to have inserted, which I will accept.

Mr. KELLY. I am altogether opposed to striking out any part of this sum. I think that every survey that is contemplated in the second section ought to be made. It is a well established fact that Congress will make no appropriation for the improvement of any river or harbor until a survey is made by some competent authority of the United States. Now, if section 2, which follows this clause, should be stricken out, of course we can expect no appropriations whatever for any work mentioned in it.

Mr. CHANDLER. Of course enough of section 2 will be restored to carry out any surveys that may be agreed upon in the committee of conference.

Mr. KELLY. I wish to say a few words in relation to those surveys proposed to be stricken out in section 2 so far as Oregon is concerned. I will refer to that section because it is affected by this proposed amendment. First is the survey of the "Cascades and Dalles of the Columbia River, Oregon and Washington Territory." That is an important matter. At the Cascades there is an obstruction in the navigation of about three miles. If that were surveyed and, as the people there think, an improvement made by canal and locks, it would open the river from the sea to east of the Cascade Mountains. It is now obstructed at that place, and the people, through the Legislatures of Oregon and Washington Territory and Idaho, have asked for an appropriation that that survey may be made. It is of very great importance to us.

Then there are three others: the Skaget River, the Snohomish River, and the Chehalis River. I speak now in behalf of the people of Washington Territory who have no representative here. They desire that those surveys should be made by some competent authority of the United States.

While I am on my feet, I will refer to an item on page 15, line 28:

Snake River, Idaho, from Shoshonee Falls to Lewiston, examination and estimates for removing bowlders and other obstructions.

That river is the boundary between Oregon and Idaho, and it is thought by many people in Idaho that if the obstructions there were removed and those at the Cascades and the Dalles, there could be a continuous line of navigation from the sea to within one hundred and fifty or two hundred miles of Salt Lake Valley. I say it is important that these surveys should be made, so that we may know in some future year, perhaps next year, whether an appropriation ought to be made. Therefore, so far as Washington Territory and Idaho Territory and the State of Oregon are concerned, I do hope the amendment will not be concurred in. Other gentlemen can speak for their own localities.

Mr. WASHBURN. I ask to offer an amendment to come in after the third line on the fourteenth page:

New Bedford Harbor, Massachusetts.

I believe the chairman of the committee proposed to accept that.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will accept it.

Mr. WASHBURN. I wish to say one word in reference to that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is this an amendment to the amendment of the committee, or is it an original amendment?

Mr. WASHBURN. It is an original amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The custom has been to act upon amendments reported by the committee in charge of the bill before other amendments are proposed. The Chair has refused to entertain other amendments, and to preserve the custom of the Senate and the consistency of the Chair he will be compelled to follow that practice.

Mr. WASHBURN. If the President understands the question, this is an amendment to the section which the committee propose to strike out, and which amendment the committee propose to have offered before the section is stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate have not reached the point where the Senator proposes to make his amendment. He will wait until that point is reached. The question is on the pending amendment of the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BOGY. What amendment is before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 14, lines 319 and 320, the committee report to strike out these words: "for the examinations and surveys of rivers and harbors, and," and in line 321 to strike out "75" and insert "25;" so that the clause will read:

For incidental repairs at harbors for which there is no special appropriation, $25,000.

Mr. BOGY. I hope the amendment will not be adopted. I think it presents a question of very great importance. The time has come when the rivers of the interior country must be examined by scientific men and the facts developed by those examinations laid before Congress that they may legislate knowingly and intelligently on the subject. To reduce this sum to $25,000 and to provide that it shall be used only for incidental repairs of harbors for which there is no special appropriation, is destroying the object which the House of Representatives had in view in appropriating $75,000 for examinations and surveys of rivers for which there are no special appropriations. It is of the greatest importance that the rivers of the interior of the country, those great outlets and means of transportation by which the vast wealth of the interior of the continent can reach the ocean, should be examined, and the amount of $75,000 is very small for that object. The harbors spoken of here are harbors on the ocean and the lakes principally.

In addition to that, we have a commerce in the interior of the country which is growing with enormous rapidity, and it becomes the duty of Congress to legislate with a view to that vast and rapidly growing commerce in the West. An examination of these rivers is of the very greatest importance. I hope, therefore, the amendment will not be adopted, but that the appropriation will remain as it passed the House, at $75,000, for examinations and surveys of rivers, as well as for incidental repairs to harbors.

Mr. HAGER. I agree with the Senator from Missouri in regard to the expediency and the necessity of retaining the section proposed to be stricken out, so far at least as the Sacramento River below Tehama and the Feather River below Marysville, California, are concerned. I will state that the Sacramento River traverses the Sacramento Valley, and I do not know that a dollar has ever been expended upon that river by the Government hitherto. It has all been done by private enterprise at the expense of private individuals to keep that river open. The whole expenditure upon the coast of California, which is far more extensive than that of the State of Michigan which the Senator has referred to, is $25,000. For that whole coast, from Oregon down to Mexico, the appropriation in this bill is the insignificant sum of $25,000 to remove a wreck in the harbor of San Francisco. After a struggle this clause was inserted in the House to obtain a survey of the Sacramento River from Tehama down, and of the Feather River from Marysville down, being navigable streams, and it is, I believe, the first attempt to improve those rivers by the order of the Government.

Mr. SARGENT. My colleague will also find a survey provided for of the San Joaquin River below Stockton, a great channel of commerce, in line 50, on the next page——

Mr. HAGER. I was going to see if the San Joaquin was in.

Mr. SARGENT. Yes, sir; it will be found in line 51, page 16.

Mr. HAGER. That river traverses the other valley running south. The principal portion of the arable lands of the State of California is the valley of the Sacramento and the valley of the San Joaquin, both of these rivers being navigable, and being necessary for the transportation of the agricultural products from the head of each valley to tide-water. Now it is proposed to obtain merely a survey in regard to the improvement of these rivers. Several hundred thousand dollars have hitherto been expended on the Sacramento River by the steam-navigation companies, and by private enterprise entirely. I hope this small effort to obtain some assistance for the navigable streams in California will not be stricken out, especially as we have but $25,000 for that whole Pacific coast appropriated in this bill. I propose to offer an amendment for an increase in regard to other harbors.

I merely wish to make another remark. I find on page 1 of this bill this clause:

For continuing the improvement of the harbor at Ontonagon, $23,000.

I ask for information why that is there, after it has been withdrawn by the Department in the revised estimates which I hold in my hand, page 22?

Mr. CHANDLER. It was restored at the request of the board of engineers; and I hold their recommendation in my hand, which was sent, and very urgently sent, to the Committee on Commerce in the other House. Here is the recommendation.

Mr. HAGER. Then the Senator will thank me for giving him the opportunity of stating that.

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly; I do very much.

Mr. MITCHELL. I desire to say a few words in reference to this matter. I shall oppose the amendment proposed by the Committee on Commerce by which they propose to strike out "seventy-five," in line 32, on page 14, and insert "twenty-five." I shall also oppose the proposed amendment to strike out the whole of section 2 of the bill, and for the reasons which I will state. It is substantially conceded by the chairman of the Committee on Commerce that there are surveys proposed by this section that are meritorious and that should be retained in this bill; but it is said by the honorable chairman that they may be retained by a committee of conference. Now, sir, I do not propose, so far as my action is concerned, to take the chances of a committee of conference in regard to a matter that is conceded to be right, in regard to surveys that ought to be retained in this bill, and which the chairman of the Committee on Commerce concedes should be retained in it. I have seen enough of the action of committees of conference in the short time I have been here to satisfy me that it is not very safe to trust to their action in regard to matters of this kind; and therefore I propose that what is right shall be retained now by the Senate.

The first survey contained in section 2, which has been stricken out by the Committee on Commerce, relates to the survey of the Cascades and Dalles to the Columbia River, Oregon, and Washington Territory. It may be that there are certain surveys provided for in this section that ought to be stricken out. If that is so, then it appears to me that that was the duty of the Committee on Commerce, and before reporting the bill they should have stricken out the proposed surveys that have no merit and retained those that have merit.

Now, sir, in regard to the survey of the Columbia River, I desire to offer this suggestion: A great cry is made here to-day by the representatives from the Mississippi Valley about the want of cheap transportation. They are paying I presume at the rate of but a little less than one cent per ton per mile, for getting their produce from Chicago to New York, for instance. I do not deny the justice of their complaint, but I desire to draw a comparison for a moment between the charges paid by the producer in the great Mississippi Valley and the charges imposed upon the producer in Oregon, Washington Territory, and Idaho. The Willamette River is no mere creek, as it was designated by the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] the other day. We are sending out to-day from the port of Portland on this "creek," so designated by the Senator from New York, over one hundred and fifty ship-loads of wheat the present year. We are paying to-day for transportation from Portland to Umatilla, a distance of two hundred miles, a freight charge of twenty-five dollars a ton. This is at the rate of twelve and a half cents per ton per mile. How does that compare with the charges imposed upon the people of the Mississippi Valley of one cent, in fact less than one cent per ton per mile that they are now paying? Nine and six-tenths mills is about the average cost of water transportation between Chicago and New York, while by rail it is a little over one cent, twelve and one-tenth mills; whereas the people of Oregon and Washington Territory are paying for transportation on their freight on the great Columbia River at the rate that I have stated, namely, twelve and a half cents per ton per mile, and that in gold coin.

Sir, this bill as reported by the Committee on Commerce proposes to give in all for the improvement of the Columbia and Willamette Rivers, how much? About $47,000 all told, less than 50 per cent. of the whole sum contained in the estimates for that service. If there is any one thing that the people of the North Pacific coast are united upon, it is on opening up the commerce of the Columbia River; it is in favor of immediate surveys of the portages at the Dalles and the Cascades of the Columbia River, and estimates made in order that the Government may be informed in regard to the practicability of constructing dams and locks, and in regard to the cost of such improvements. Therefore I object to striking out the whole section containing proposed improvements so meritorious as this one is, simply because there may possibly be certain proposed improvements contained in the section that have no merit.

A survey is asked here of the Snake River, extending on up to Idaho, so as to connect the waters of the Columbia River with the point where the North Pacific Railroad will strike the waters of that river. A small appropriation is asked for the survey of that river. That has been stricken out, and yet it is a matter of vital importance to the people of the North Pacific coast, and a matter that will cost comparatively but a small sum, as has been stated by my colleague. The Legislatures of Oregon, of Idaho, and of Washington Territory have been unanimous in their demand for a survey and estimates at the Cascades and Dalles of the Columbia River. It seems to me it would be doing that portion of our country a very great injustice to refuse them the small favor they ask, of having a survey made, which at most can cost but a very small sum, in order that the Engineer Department of the Government may be advised with reference to the practicability and cost of these proposed improvements.

I do not desire to detain the Senate, but I insist that the amendment proposed by the Committee on Commerce in reference to this whole section should be voted down and the section retained.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Committee on Commerce recommended the striking out of the whole section for the reason, that the recommendations and papers on which this section was put in were not before the Committee on Commerce. The committee were aware that there were some surveys which ought to be made. Undoubtedly those to which the Senator from Oregon alludes ought to be made; but in regard to appropriations for Oregon every dollar that was recommended either in the original or the revised estimates of the engineers has been appropriated.

Mr. MITCHELL. I beg pardon. The Senator must be wrong.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have the papers before me, and I say that in every instance the revised and original estimates have been followed in regard to Oregon, and I believe that is the only instance where that has been done in any of the appropriations before the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MITCHELL. What is the estimate for the Upper Columbia River?

Mr. CHANDLER. The original estimate was $20,000; the revised estimate $20,000; and the appropriation is $20,000.

Mr. MITCHELL. What does the report of the Chief of Engineers say?

Mr. CHANDLER. I have it before me.

Mr. MITCHELL. I read from page 1122 of the report of the Chief of Engineers:

The following is a statement of the moneys expended and available for this improvement during the fiscal year—

Speaking in reference to the improvement of the Upper Columbia River—

Available July 1, 1872	$50,000 00

That was the appropriation made in 1872. There was no appropriation made for the present fiscal year; and the Chief of Engineers is now speaking in reference to the appropriation made in 1872, and the improvement made in pursuance of that appropriation, and he says:

Expended—
Removal of rocks	$19,296 69
Superintendence, office expenses, &c	2,488 98
		21,785 67
Balance on hand June 30, 1873		28,214 33
Amount required for fiscal year 1874-'75		50,000 00

That is what the Chief of Engineers says in regard to it, that the amount required for the next fiscal year, not the present fiscal year, is $50,000.

The amount asked for the next fiscal year will be applied to the improvement of Homly Rapid, and such other work as may tend eventually to put the rest of the river, from the Dalles to the crossing of the North Pacific Railroad, (near Snake River,) in the same condition for navigation as the John Day, Umatilla, and Devil's Bend will be when the present contract is finished.

Next, in reference to the estimates for the Upper Willamette River, the amount allowed by the House and also reported by the Committee on Commerce of the Senate is $7,500. I will read what the engineer says in relation to that.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator will pardon me, he is reading from the report of the local engineers, while I am reading from the report of the Chief of Engineers, as submitted by the President at the opening of the session. We are reading from entirely different documents.

Mr. WEST. There is no particular question in the amendment that concerns my locality, but I think the Senate ought to understand in general terms what the proposition of the committee is. This bill as it comes from the House includes an appropriation of $75,000 for the surveys of the various water-channels of the country embraced within twenty-six States and Territories of the Union. Therefore twenty-six States and Territories are interested in having these surveys prosecuted. The amount appropriated for this purpose last year was $200,000.

Mr. CHANDLER. One hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars.

Mr. WEST. One hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars last year. The Senator is correct. I meant to say that $200,000 was asked for this year. Two hundred thousand dollars was asked for, and the House of Representatives have given $75,000, or $3,000 to each State and Territory, averaging it, to be distributed throughout this whole Union in the prosecution of the surveys of the water courses of the country. Has anything more penurious been recommended by any committee than to reduce that down to $1,000 per State and Territory? I do not think when the Senate understand it they will accede to any such proposition.

Mr. DAVIS. Let me correct my friend from Louisiana. The committee's amendment proposes to give nothing whatever to any State for surveys; and if the amendment be adopted no survey can be made in any State.

Mr. WEST. That is so, I see, except for repairs. Now, with the experience we have had appropriating here year after year hundreds of thousands of dollars for this purpose, when the Department ask for $200,000, it is penurious and poor economy to restrict it to merely $25,000 for repairs. I am convinced when the Senate understand the matter they will vote it down.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to make an appeal to the Senate. I sought immediately after the close of the morning hour to call up the conference report on the currency bill. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] expressed a wish to look at the report, and said he would be willing to take it up at the end of an hour. I find myself quite indisposed, and yet exceedingly anxious to get the conference report out of the way. I am also expecting every moment to be called off upon another conference committee. I have no wish to say one word in reference to this report, but I trust the Senate will by unanimous consent let us dispose of it and get it out of the way. I ask therefore unanimous consent that the conference report on House bill No. 1572 be taken up. I do not want to say a word on the subject, and I hope the vote will be taken at once so that we get it out of the way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to proceeding to the consideration of the conference report on House bill No. 1572? The Chair hears none, and it is before the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. Subject to call for the river and harbor bill if it shall lead to debate?

Mr. WRIGHT. Certainly.

THE CURRENCY—BANKING.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) The conference report on the bill (H. R. No. 1572) to amend the several acts providing a national currency and to establish free banking, and for other purposes, is before the Senate.

Mr. FLANAGAN. If no other Senator is disposed to present any opposition to this measure it is very unnecessary for me to do so; but my opinion is, candidly, with all deference to my friend from Iowa and the committee, that it would have been better for this report to have slept for all time to come. It begins in nothing as I conceive, and ends most beautifully likewise. If there is beginning or end to it I have not been able to find it. I suppose this is the action of the Congress of the United States after having been six months earnestly and closely engaged in endeavoring to do something toward the resumption of specie payments, a subject that at last has been studiously, ingeniously, and well avoided, for it is ignored in every sense of the word. If that is what this nation wants on the subject of finance, it is peculiarly successful under this report. It is merely in my opinion the first direct step to repudiation. It is nothing else; surely it is nothing more, for in it the idea of aspecie resumption at any day, either direct or remote, is not alluded to, if I recollect the reading correctly.

Now, sir, I think much better would it have been if this matter were permitted to pass quietly, no action being taken by Congress, but admitting to the world frankly and without equivocation that the Congress of the United States were not able to grapple with the great subject, for most assuredly, as I have remarked, this is an unqualified failure. It does nothing one way or the other, as I conceive, except to try to satisfy to some extent particular States who claim they have not been fairly dealt by in the distribution of facilities for organizing national banks.

Under this bill I have no hesitancy in saying here that $20,000,000 in the next current year will not be removed from the North for banking purposes West. I have no objection, so far as I am concerned, that every dollar of it shall be removed; but there will be no demand for it, as I conceive, to the amount contemplated here. I interpose no objection whatever; but that is the only boon that I can perceive will be realized, if that should be, and I have no idea that it will be. Time will certainly demonstrate who is correct on that branch of the subject.

But instead of meeting this great question as it deserves to be met, everything tending to a resumption of specie payments is directly ignored for the present. So regarding it, and looking at the action upon this subject for months past, and invoking the history, if you please, not only of this nation from its earliest day to the present hour, but the history of the world, I am justified in holding that we shall get further and further from resumption. Certainly it is not contemplated in this report, and I for one regret that the report has ever found its way to Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the report.

Mr. FLANAGAN. I ask for the yeas and nays on this document.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This report, as far as it provides for the redistribution of banking facilities, I am entirely satisfied with, as we have often voted in the Senate and have said over and over again. The chief objection that I have to the report is that it abolishes the reserve that the banks have hitherto been obliged to keep. Inasmuch as in my brief experience I never knew a bank that could honestly keep itself above water without keeping a reserve to meet the demands in panics and sudden runs upon it, I think the provision in this report which provides for abolishing all reserves is a very dangerous and improper one. You may say that all prudent bankers will keep reserves. So they will; but all prudent bankers, like prudent Senators, are sometimes tempted by persuasion to do things which if they were left entirely to themselves they would not do. And then there is another class of banks probably in this country, those who may be classed as not prudent bankers, those in respect to whom (as you have as to all banks, speaking largely) you must provide limitations and restraints by law. I think this the first time in the history of legislation respecting banks in any well-ordered community, as the United States is, where under any system of banking like this or any other that we have had, that it was proposed by law to provide in terms that no bank shall be obliged to keep a reserve to meet sudden runs upon it. Now to keep 15 per cent. of the deposits, for that is what I believe the country banks have to keep, merely to stand a run on deposits, is in a panic nothing at all; your 15 per cent. of deposits would be run out before the first half of the first day if a run on a bank took place.

I think that we shall make a great mistake when we authorize the banks of the United States to loan all the money that they have of capital paid in and of deposits made, excepting the 15 per cent. of the deposits which is to be reserved for the purpose of paying deposits. So far as the presentation of bills for redemption is concerned, as distinguished by a run by depositors, there probably is not any very great danger, because the bonds of the United States, with a reasonable credit to the Government, are sufficient for that, although the bill-holders would be embarrassed if half the banks of the United States should refuse to pay all at once. It would force bonds of the United States upon the market to such an extent that it is altogether doubtful whether the security would be good even then.

But, passing that, it does appear to me (and I should be glad to have my honorable friend from Iowa explain because he may convince me that he is right) that it is most unsound in principle and most dangerous in practice for the future to authorize these institutions, which we hold out to the people as existing under Government authority and entitled to credit, to loan all the resources that they have of every description down to 15 per cent. of their deposits, because I fear it will turn out, as I think human experience has shown it has generally turned out, that wherever a stress comes and people run for their deposits, as they always do in a panic, half the banks in the country will break for the reason that the law has allowed them to strip themselves under the pressure for discounts of all their means to meet a run. I do not see that it is a sufficient answer to that to say that prudent banking would not be conducted upon such a principle, that prudent bankers would not loan all the money they had down to 15 per cent. of their deposits.

Of course, in a prosperous state of the country, with a flowing tide, and with no breakdown, no panic, no sudden emergency which disturbs the operations of trade and commerce, it is of no consequence. So we may say that no limitation is of any consequence when the millennium comes; but we know, if the world goes on as it has gone, that there will be once in twenty years at the furthest a time when, from natural causes, not affected by legislation, not remediable by legislation, there will be a sudden depression of enterprise, of trade, of commerce, of industry, of all the business operations of the country; there will be a panic, in short, or a crisis, or a bankruptcy, call it what you will according to degree, and then there will be a sudden demand coming with the rapidity of a summer shower or a gust that will require from every bank in the country the withdrawal of the deposits that have been made in it; and then this bank instead of being fortified as it is now by holding this percentage of all its resources, will have only, if it holds up to that, the 15 per cent. of its deposits; and the result will be, as anybody can see, that on every such occasion one-half of the banks at least in the country will go to protest on the first day. Of course nobody will maintain that that would be an advantage to the business of the country. Nobody will maintain that a bank ought to be allowed to lend money to such an extent that it cannot stand a run when some sudden pressure shall be brought to bear at a time when people, to meet their engagements, need the money which they have on deposit and which has been loaned out to somebody for other speculations. Sound banking cannot go on in that way; and therefore it is that it appears to me that we ought to consider at least the grounds upon which this report stands in the respect to which I have alluded.

I do not know, after all we have done, that I can have any expectation that this report will not be adopted. Of course it presents entirely different questions from those which we have considered hitherto. They are not questions which affect one section of the country more than another, as anybody may suppose; but there is now presented, separate from other questions that have so divided us, this simple question of business as it respects the safety of a principle of banking carried on under the authority of the Government. If there is any explanation which my honorable friend from Iowa can make to us, as it may be there is—he is a much greater financier than I am in proportion to our respective capitals—then I should be glad to hear it. But it does appear to me, as I have said, that we shall make a great mistake for the protection of the business interests of this country and of the people who deposit their little savings and earnings in banks, if we allow a bank to loan out all of its capital, and all of its deposits save 15 per cent. of its deposits, (if that is the amount as to the country banks,) and thus put ourselves in an attitude where in a pressure the banks cannot pay back again to the depositors at once the money they have received. I should be very glad indeed to hear my friend from Iowa explain the grounds of this report.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have but one word to say in that connection. The section in the report as it stands is precisely as it passed the House and passed the Senate, and has been agreed to by both Houses.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But has not been brought under discussion.

Mr. WRIGHT. There never has been any question raised on this part of the bill before. It seemed to be agreed to on all hands to this day to be a proper provision to release the reserve on circulation and retain the reserve on deposits. The reason for it was that so far as the security of the bill-holders was concerned there was ample security in the bonds here deposited, and that in case of a panic the reserve that is provided for circulation would amount to nothing in the world; and not only so but every good banker, every safe banker, would provide for his reserve judiciously without any provision of this kind. Therefore it was agreed on all hands that it was best to leave out the reserve on circulation. That point was discussed more than once here in the Senate and the whole ground gone over.

I do not propose to go into the matter at all. I am only anxious to have a vote and let the Senate dispose of this bill and get it out of the way.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the yeas and nays had not been called for, I should not have said one word on this question; nor do I intend to say anything except to reply to one or two observations of the Senator from Vermont. As to the last three sections of this bill, as I understand, they are precisely similar to the bill for the redistribution of the banking circulation reported early in the session from the Committee on Finance. I do not see any variation.

Mr. WRIGHT. Except in the amount.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, instead of $25,000,000 the committee of conference insert $55,000,000. I call the attention of the Senator from Vermont and other Senators to the sixth section of this bill:

> That the amount of United States notes outstanding and to be used as a part of the circulating medium shall not exceed the sum of $382,000,000, which said sum shall appear in each monthly statement of the public debt, and no part thereof shall be held or used as a reserve.

I regard this section as chiefly beneficial as forever repealing the fictitious idea of a legal reserve. There is not one word in any law of the United States which implies that any portion of the $400,000,000 shall be held as a reserve. That is merely a mythical creation of the Treasury Department for the purpose of keeping up the notes which had been canceled.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That was not a point to which I spoke at all.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know that. This, however, will not prevent the accumulation of a necessary working balance. The Senator from Iowa understands that. The Secretary of the Treasury sometimes may have a balance of $2,000,000, and sometimes $20,000,000. This does not interfere with that in the slightest degree.

Mr. SARGENT. Allow me to ask a question on that point. Suppose a panic comes on, as before, when there is a Treasury balance of $13,000,000, how would the Secretary of the Treasury in view of this law stand up against a clamor to put that money out of the Treasury which it was insisted was reserved? He would be asked, "Why are you holding it?" They would insist it should go out either for the purchase of bonds or in other methods. It is made unlawful for him to hold it, so when it is proper to hold it to guard the Treasury, the Treasury would soon be out of funds, as it would have been during the last panic under any such provision.

Mr. SHERMAN. As a matter of course if the Secretary of the Treasury has $15,000,000, or whatever may be a necessary working balance, he will be governed in paying out that money according to the exigencies of the Treasury Department and not according to the clamor of speculators if he performs his duty as this bill contemplates that he shall. I simply wished to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that although the maximum is fixed at $382,000,000, in this currency bill there is no provision allowing additional United States notes.

Mr. SARGENT. Will the Senator show me any language in this or any other law that allows him to accumulate a working balance, if this provision stands that there shall be no reserve?

Mr. SHERMAN. It says that "no part thereof shall be held as reserve." "Reserve" is a technical name of an amount of money applied for a specific purpose, but a working balance is an amount of money useful for all purposes. That is the difference. "Reserve" is a technical name which was applied first to the $50,000,000 reserved under the law of 1864, and afterward to the mythical reserve created by the Treasury Department as a matter of book-keeping.

Now in regard to the second and third sections—and here I want the attention of the Senator from Vermont—it is true that the second section does abolish the reserve on circulation, and there never was any reason for that reserve originally because the security of the bonds was more than sufficient to secure the redemption of the notes; and it has been recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury at different times, according to my recollection, and at any rate there has been a general demand that the reserve on circulation should be abolished. The committee of conference have in the third section provided a fixed, operative, and strong mode of redeeming national-bank notes. Any holder of national-bank bills may present them at any time at the Treasury and demand United States notes. The provisions of the third section are amply sufficient, in my judgment, to provide for the redemption of the national-bank notes. There can be no question of it. And in my judgment—I record it here rather as a prophecy for the future than as an argument to the Senate—this 5 per cent. reserve will be more difficult to be maintained by the banks than the mere loss of the 15 per cent. reserve, three-fifths of which could be deposited in New York, and only two-fifths of which was required to be retained in the bank. In the third section there is a provision made by which the banks will be compelled to keep themselves strong enough in order not only to maintain the 5 per cent. in the Treasury, but in order to respond at all times to the demand of the Treasury for money to maintain this reserve of 5 per cent.

There is nothing in this bill that has not received the sanction of both Houses, taken separately. There is nothing in this bill to which I think any Senator ought to object, and I was in hopes that every Senator would vote for this report without objection. The question of the increase of paper money, either in the form of greenbacks or bank-notes, is postponed. The question of the resumption of specie payments is postponed. There is no time fixed and no provision here made for the resumption of specie payments. All that this bill does is to modify slightly the reserve of the national banks, to make a practical provision for the redemption of bank-notes, and to provide for a redistribution of bank circulation. Every one of these objects, it seems to me, ought to meet the concurrence of the Senate by a unanimous vote, and I was in hopes the report would pass without a division.

Mr. SARGENT. I think this bill is very much better than any other one that we have had up heretofore with a prospect of passage. Nevertheless it seems to me that there are some infelicities in the bill which it is to be regretted are not eliminated from it and that there is now no opportunity to do so.

I certainly cannot vote for the bill with my understanding of the sixth section. There is, as the Senator from Ohio remarked, no law defining what a reserve is, so that the word "reserve" may just as well be applied to a working balance as to an amount in dispute between the Treasury Department and the Congress of the United States as to the sum which shall be outstanding of United States notes.

Mr. SHERMAN. If I stated that there was no law defining the meaning of "reserve," I stated it too strongly. There is one definition, the only definition on the statute-book of a reserve of United States notes, and that is the reserve defined by the act of 1864, which provides that in excess of the four hundred millions there may be a reserve of fifty millions which shall be used only for the purpose of paying the floating indebtedness or accruing indebtedness, and shall be used for no other purpose, and shall be retired and canceled when the debt for which it is reserved is discharged.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator is entirely correct in reference to that, but that relates to a past age, a past condition of things. There is now no amount of $400,000,000 of United States notes and no $50,000,000 beyond that authorized by any existing law; so that there is now no law on the statute-book, as the Senator remarked before, and certainly remarked accurately, defining what is meant by a reserve; and the only thing this section can take hold of in the way of reserve is the working balance which it may be desirable to retain in the Treasury for the very purpose of meeting floating indebtedness.

The object of making this appear in each monthly statement of the public debt is to see that the Treasury is kept bare, that the $382,000,000 of money are kept out and do not come in there to be held as a reserve or a working balance; and under that condition of things the Treasury is liable to go to protest any day in the year, and most especially is the Secretary of the Treasury liable to solicitation, to pressure, to complaint, to clamor, which it is difficult for any man to resist in the time of a panic when there are representations made to him and to the President of the United States pressing upon them that an emission of a few more millions of money will tide the country over bankruptcy, will prevent disastrous consequences, and then he is pointed to a law which expressly declares that no part of the $382,000,000 shall be kept or used as reserve; and the interpretation is insisted upon, and is a reasonable interpretation, that that means that he shall not reserve any portion of that amount in the Treasury for any purpose whatever. He would be required under this law by a reasonable interpretation of it to pay it out, and then the Treasury goes to protest, and the Treasury itself would have been bankrupt during the last panic provided a law like this had been upon the statute-book.

For that reason and others which I might name, I cannot assent to the report, and I desire, when the yeas and nays are called, to record my vote in the negative.

Mr. STEVENSON. I desire to say a single word. The committee of conference have been called upon to consider and act upon the difficult problem of reporting some projet upon the currency which should heartily receive the concurrence of both Houses of Congress. To insure success for any recommendation it was necessary at the outset that the conferees should in their action endeavor to agree on some plan of adjustment which would reconcile the variant views and diverse expressions of opinion which had found vent in the long discussion of our finances going through so many months of the present session.

The report upon your table is the result of the labors of that conference. I have hitherto taken no part in this financial debate, and should not now do so, but that I was on the conference committee. No one will pretend that the report contains all that Senators upon either side might desire. A conference from its nature implies concession and compromise of opinion between the two Houses. This report seeks that object. It recommends in the main two simple propositions, each of which separately have hitherto received a large majority of this body. Mr. President, I have myself been neither for contraction nor expansion. I preferred to stand still. I have strongly desired to see at the earliest possible moment at which the condition of the country would allow it without injury to its interest and without pecuniary distress a resumption of specie payments. I have been, however, unwilling to take any step which should inflate the currency beyond the point of legalizing the twenty-six millions of greenbacks issued by the Secretary of the Treasury, and reducing tax upon the circulation of the State banks to the standard of taxation imposed upon national banks. I desired neither to add to the volume of irredeemable national currency, nor to contract it by fixing any short day for specie payments. I have always desired a just distribution of the circulation according to wealth and population from the East, which has more than its quota, to the South and West.

I have been reared, Mr. President, in a political school whose founders denied that Congress possessed any constitutional authority to charter national banks. They warned us that the creation by Congress of large, irresponsible moneyed corporations might endanger the liberties of the country. Their political faith was that gold and silver constituted the only true standard of value and was the only currency known to and contemplated by the Constitution of the United States. While it is true that eminent statesmen differed on the question of constitutional power to charter a bank, all of them, from Alexander Hamilton to Andrew Jackson, including Daniel Webster himself, believed and argued that Congress possessed no power to substitute paper or anything else for coin as a tender in payment of debts and in discharge of contracts. Had this orthodox faith of the fathers been adhered to, what financial distress and loss of property would have been spared from panics inaugurated by a fluctuating, deranged, depreciated currency; what an amount of debt would have been spared the country!

Our present national-bank system sprung from and was the direct outgrowth of the late rebellion. Its founder acknowledged it as a war measure, not sanctioned in peace by the Constitution. Congress has solemnly pledged itself to use all means and take all necessary steps for a prompt redemption of this paper currency. Nine years have passed away since the cessation of hostilities, abundant harvests have blessed the labors of our people, and yet Congress is urged at this session to increase the volume of greenbacks and national-bank currency without providing means for its redemption in coin.

I felt constrained to resist this proposed inflation. I was at all times ready to legalize to the amount of twenty-six millions of greenbacks illegally put into circulation by the late Secretary of the Treasury and keep them in circulation. I favored a redistribution of the circulation of greenbacks upon the basis of wealth and population and desired a transfer of fifty or sixty millions from the East to the South and West. I desired a reduction of the tax upon the circulation of State banks from its present unjust standard to that imposed upon the national banks. I could not and will not cast a vote to inflate the currency of national banks, nor could I vote for free banking except on a basis of redemption in gold and silver. I have been compelled to differ in my votes on this question from many of my friends in the South and West with whom I am accustomed to act. We have been led to different lines of action from a conviction of duty.

I have been severely criticised for my course. I pass it by. Every public man is subject to criticism. I have been charged with open misrepresentation of my constituency in my votes on the currency question. I have received no such expression of the popular sentiment in Kentucky as enables me to say whether my constituency approve or disapprove my course in resisting inflation. I am proud to say I have received neither in the democratic press of my State nor by private letters any proof of such popular disapprobation.

I have in every vote which I have given on this currency question followed old democratic landmarks illustrated by Jefferson and Jackson in their adherence to a sound, fixed standard of value. While I have not sought to hasten a speedy resumption of specie payments or given any vote looking to such an immediate result because I did not wish to produce sudden contraction, I have, upon the other hand, sought steadily to prevent an inflation of the currency in irredeemable paper or free banking on a paper basis, but preferred quietly to hold to our present position, which I trust will lead to specie resumption during the next three or four years.

Mr. President, the people of Kentucky have a large experience on the subject of a depreciated paper currency. They are not easily persuaded that one paper depreciated dollar can be converted into two dollars by cutting it into two parts. Their native sense tells them that the value of a currency is to be measured by its purchasing capacity on a standard of gold and silver. They will not be deceived. They know that the laboring masses have the deepest interest in a sound, stable currency convertible into specie.

Whatever it costs to convert the depreciated paper money received by the producer or laborer into specie is a loss to that extent upon them. The greater the excess of our paper circulation above the business wants of the country the greater the depreciation of our paper currency below a specie standard. It is this excess which I desire to avoid. The only test of an excess of circulation is to be found in the fact that our greenbacks or paper promises to pay twenty or one hundred dollars can only be cashed by the laborer or producer who receives at one hundred cents on the dollar at eighty-eight cents. An American dollar should buy a silver dollar in England, adding the cost of transportation, because the laborer received it here as a silver dollar. But take our greenbacks to England and (outside of the cost of transportation) they would be received by labor for its purchases there at a fraction of a little over eighty-five cents. The producer or laboring man would by practical experience learn where the loss would fall.

But besides I am opposed to any increase of the power of the national banks. Never have the warnings of Andrew Jackson against the danger of colossal moneyed corporations appeared more prophetic than at this hour. Let those who desire to avoid these dangers take care how they add to or increase the power of these national banks. If we are to inflate at all let us adhere to the greenbacks, and not entail increased taxation upon the people by increasing national-bank circulation.

But I have been inadvertently drawn from my purpose, which was simply to explain the conference report. The redistributing by a transfer of fifty-four millions from the East to the South and West when the business need of the latter shall require it, is a matter so eminently just and equitable and so often voted by Senators from every section and of opposite opinions, that there would seem to be no possible objection to that. Upon the subject of the twenty-six millions of greenbacks, the circulation of which is legalized by this report, I have already said all that is necessary.

I think the repeal requiring redemption in New York will be found to work well in practice. So long as the banks were required to redeem in New York they were compelled to keep a certain portion of their circulation there. During the panic of last September I am quite sure that some of the strongest banks in Cincinnati and Covington were unable to get any of their circulation deposited with the banks in New York for redemption, but had to go through upon mere certificates of the New York banks.

The conference report sought to embody only these propositions as a whole which in the protracted discussions of the past few months seemed in the Senate to have been generally concurred in.

The report is not subject to the criticism that if it be adopted the Secretary of the Treasury must keep out the whole of the three hundred and eighty-two millions. There is nothing in this objection which deprives the Secretary of the Treasury of keeping always that safe working balance which prudence and experience will ever suggest and demand. And the words of the amendment, that no part of the three hundred and eighty-two millions shall be regarded as a reserve, are not opposed to or inconsistent with that working balance. As the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] justly said, the word "reserve" is a technical term in the banking act, and does not and cannot by any just construction apply as a restriction upon any safe working balance which every Secretary of the Treasury always and necessarily must keep on hand.

Mr. President, while I am opposed to inflation, in every vote I have given I have sought to avoid the evils of a suddenly diminished circulation. The committee gave up free banking because such a system demanded a gold basis, or a fixed day at short date for resumption of specie payments. That might, and possibly would, have led to sudden contraction by the banks by a refusal of renewals and in a preparation for resumption.

They gave up a convertible bond at low interest because it could not command general concurrence. I hope the report will be concurred in.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, in a very early part of this session I expressed the opinion that what we ought to do was to redistribute a portion of the national-bank currency. I was very much of the opinion that that was all we should do, and I am confirmed in it by the report of this committee of conference. I shall vote for agreeing to this report. I believe it is the best thing that we are likely to agree upon. In fact, if it be rejected, nothing will be effected by Congress.

Objection has been made on account of the abolition of the reserve on circulation; but I think practically this provision for keeping 5 per cent. in the Treasury and allowing notes to be presented there and redeemed in greenbacks will prove in practice more efficient than the present circulation reserve. That is my firm belief. At present there is no such thing as the redemption of bank-notes. They are not presented because you cannot assort them and go off hundreds of miles to get greenbacks for them; but under this provision, although it will impose some pretty onerous duties on the Treasury Department, there will be a practical redemption of bank-notes to a very considerable amount in greenbacks, and as those greenbacks may be made to appreciate in value and come nearer to specie, so will this redemption become more common and be of more value.

Without taking up the time of the Senate on this subject, and without certainly saying that this bill is just what I would have it to be if I had the making of the law, for it is not—and perhaps what I would wish would not suit anybody else exactly—I say that in my judgment the bill which is now reported contains but little or no evil and may be productive of considerable good; and as it is the last chance we have of agreeing upon anything I have come to the conclusion that I can and ought to sustain the report.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I shall vote for this report as being the best thing we can get at this session, and the only thing; but I do not support it as the full or complete measure of justice or as at all meeting the public demands and exigencies, and in nowise as a settlement of the question which is before the country. The question is to whether the monopoly feature of the national banking system shall be abolished, as to whether the legal-tender act shall be repealed, and all questions coming in that purview are left to the future. I vote for it as a matter of imperfect and very tardy justice. As a measure of distribution it comes just twenty-five millions short of the amount required for a full redistribution, as shown by the report of the Comptroller of the Currency. Any measure of distribution ought to be a full one, and there is no good reason why this should not have been a full one.

But, Mr. President, there are some good features about this bill aside from the question of doing justice to States that have been shorn of their proper proportion of banking facilities under the original basis for the distribution of that currency. The best feature about this bill is the one that was criticised by the Senator from Vermont, that it abolishes the reserve on circulation. That is a cast-iron reserve, the banks being required by law to keep it at all times without regard to demand, without regard to panic or anything else.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator mean to say that that is the present law; that they are bound to keep this reserve at all times?

Mr. MORTON. They are bound to keep a reserve on circulation equal to a certain amount, and if it is ever diminished they have got to make that up.

Mr. EDMUNDS. O, yes; that is another thing.

Mr. MORTON. I do not say that they would have to keep it up in advance. I mean that when they pay it out they have got to make it up under the law immediately.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Precisely. That is another thing. The Senator stated that they were bound to keep it at all times and against all demands. I thought that the present law was that they were bound to keep it and not loan it, to have it ready to meet demands on them for their circulation or for their deposits, and when it gets below they are bound to make it up again.

Mr. MORTON. I stated what I meant by it, and I do not think my friend misunderstands me. I stated that this was to be kept as a cast-iron reserve without regard to panic and without regard to deposits, a reserve of 15 per cent. in country banks on circulation and of 25 per cent. in the redemption cities. There never was any good reason for it. Practically the banks are not called upon to redeem, for the reason that there is but little use in redemption. Bank-notes are so good that people do not care about having them redeemed. There is no use in going to that trouble. The bank-notes are perfectly secured by the bonds deposited in the Treasury of the United States, and the people have entire confidence in the currency. It is not the case of an old-fashioned bank-note, where the people were never certain that the bank had the gold to redeem.

That law now requires the banks to keep 15 per cent. of reserve on circulation, which just to that extent diminishes their capacity to accommodate the people. Three-fifths of the reserve of country banks may be kept in the cities of redemption. What has been the practical effect of that? That while two-fifths had to be kept locked up in the vaults of the bank under the law, being 6 per cent., three-fifths or 9 per cent. the banks were compelled to send to other cities and loan there as a deposit, getting only 4 per cent. on it, while the people in their neighborhoods were deprived of the use of that money as a matter of accommodation. The people in the cities got it, and the banks used to loan it at 4 per cent. instead of being allowed to loan it as they would their other funds, at the current rate of interest. This bill corrects that evil, so that the banks may now keep the whole of this money at home to loan to the people in the neighborhood without being required to send three-fifths of it off to a distant city.

The effect of the abolition of reserve will be, as I am advised, that in busy seasons of the year, say when the crops are to be moved, it will set free and put into circulation some $31,000,000 of legal-tender notes that the law now requires the banks to keep locked up in their vaults. It is a practical measure of relief, it is a practical measure of expansion to that extent.

So far as my own State is concerned this bill will afford to her I presume but very little relief. She may get half a million under it. I do not know what the calculation will be. She may get even less than that, because she has come up within several hundred thousand dollars of her technical proportion under the original basis of apportionment made out ten years ago. In the mean time the State has grown enormously. No State is growing faster according to her population, or developing more rapidly; and yet there were before the panic from twenty to forty localities in my State that needed banks and will need them and will be glad to have the opportunity of establishing them, if the law allows them to do so, whenever the times shall improve a little. This bill does not afford much relief to my State so far as increased banking capital is concerned. So far as Ohio is concerned I presume she will not get a dollar under this bill, and some of those States that really need banking facilities, which are among the most progressive and growing States, will get no relief; but such States as Illinois, Missouri, Iowa, Wisconsin, Minnesota, and all the Southern States will have a large portion of the circulation allotted to them that they cannot now get. To that extent justice will be done to them and relief will be afforded to them. But so far as other States that need circulation almost or quite as badly are concerned, they will get little or none under it. So far as they are concerned, therefore, the question is simply postponed.

Now I want to say a word in regard to the question made about the Treasury reserve. One of the good features of this report is that it abolishes what is called the $44,000,000 reserve. It destroys that idea. What was that idea? That there were $44,000,000 in the Treasury, the difference between $356,000,000 and $400,000,000, that might be issued when needed, and when the pressure had passed by should be taken back into the Treasury, and if you please canceled in the Treasury or laid away as reserve, and not as a part of the working balance. That is entirely separate and distinct from the idea of a working balance. When the panic began the Treasury had a working balance of about $13,000,000 that was wholly distinct from the reserve, and the Government did employ, I believe, the entire working balance in the purchase of bonds, commencing about the 20th of September, and the working balance was expended in that way. But afterward, when the revenues ran short, the reserve was brought out, not as a part of the working balance, but as a reserve, entirely independent of the $26,000,000 afterward issued. The theory was entertained by the Secretary of the Treasury, and it has been lately restated in the President's veto message, that this was a balance to be preserved, kept on hand for emergencies, so that under that theory the Secretary of the Treasury could contract the currency in circulation, independent of the necessary working balance of ten or fifteen millions, with the first surplus revenue at his command to the amount of $26,000,000. That is a perpetual threat hanging over the country. That power is taken away distinctly by this bill. Therefore the fear of contraction resulting from taking back into the Treasury the $26,000,000 of the $44,000,000 reserve has been taken away.

I shall for the reasons I have given support the bill, but not as a settlement of the great question.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Ohio the effect of the third section of this bill. It provides a new way for redemption. I want to inquire what the effect of that plan of redemption will be upon the exchanges of the country.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think it will have any effect, except this: The first effect of it will be to bring in all the worn and mutilated bank-notes, of which it is estimated there are nearly $100,000,000, nearly a third of the whole amount of circulation, unfit for use. We endeavored by a law of last winter to get it in, and failed because the banks did not make the requisite application. Under this third section that currency will all come in and be exchanged for new notes of the same banks. I do not think it will make any difference in the exchanges.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Is it not a fact to-day that there is no cost on exchanges between one section of the country and another?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think this will make any difference in that respect.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Is not that a fact to-day?

Mr. SHERMAN. That is now the fact.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. It being a fact that there is no cost to any party in making exchange between one section of the country and another, the question arises, why is that? I think it is because you have adopted the present system of bank-note redemption in the different business centers of the country, and they all settle in the centers of commercial business.

Mr. SHERMAN. I fear I misunderstood the question. The Senator asked if there was no difference in the rate of exchange now. There is not on bank bills, but there is on money certainly. Exchange on Saint Louis and Cincinnati and Cleveland is at a little premium. I thought the Senator confined his question to bank-notes.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. It is a fact that there may be at times a difference in the cost of exchange between New Orleans and New York and other sections of the country.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is so between New York and every city almost.

Mr. ALCORN. It is very rare indeed to find exchange at par in any portion of the country. It is nearly always either at a premium or a discount.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I understand that; but at the same time I understand that bank-notes are of equal value in all parts of the country. Let me put this question, then, to the Senator from Ohio: if you adopt this system of redemption will bank-notes be of equal value in all sections of the country?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly. Bank-notes in every portion of the country can be sent to Washington and here be redeemed. As a matter of course, as every bank is bound to receive the notes of every other bank, there can be no difference in that respect. It may be possible that if bank-notes should accumulate in New York or any other place largely, they would be sent to Washington for redemption in greenbacks.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Will not then a bank-note in Saint Louis or Cincinnati be worth as much less than par as it would cost to transport it from Saint Louis or Cincinnati to the Treasury?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it is so now. Sometimes greenbacks are at a premium over bank-notes because of the difficulty of redemption.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Not on that amount, I believe.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is because it is practically impossible to assort the notes of the various banks and present them to the proper bank for redemption.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. My own idea of this section is that if it becomes a law and the system of bank redemption should ever be of any value so that you could exchange a bank-note for coin, you will find a great difference in the exchanges, much to the injury of the commercial interests of the county.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I was somewhat surprised to see with what cordiality my friend, the distinguished Senator holding the place of chairman of the Committee on Finance, walks up to this report of the conference committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is not a word in this bill but what my friend from Vermont himself has cordially and heartily consented to report as I understand.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. SHERMAN. What part is there that the Senator has not agreed to?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It makes a mighty difference whether these provisions are coupled with others or not. These provisions might be accepted if they were coupled with some others looking toward specie resumption. I understand that the Senator from Ohio has from the outset called our attention over and over again to the duty, to the pledges that Congress was under of looking at the earliest practicable time for a resumption of specie payments. Now, there is not one word, syllable, or sign of specie resumption in this proposed conference bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Because I cannot get a majority of both Houses of Congress to agree to specie resumption, shall I therefore refuse to vote for every bill on the subject of banking and currency? I ask my friend from Vermont whether he himself did not vote for this redistribution bill when we reported it early in the session, separately and by itself?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. To that part of the present report I make no objection, and I should vote for it cheerfully separate and distinct or coupled with anything else to which there were no valid objections.

Mr. SHERMAN. Has the Senator not voted for and does he not agree to this mode of redeeming bank-notes in greenbacks in Washington at the Treasury?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. But whenever I have voted for that it has been coupled with other provisions looking toward specie resumption. In the former bill where these provisions were inserted there was a positive provision for the redemption of the legal-tender notes to the amount of $82,000,000. All that is now left out. But, Mr. President, I am quite aware that Senators, after having a subject of this kind long before them, having debated and discussed the matter until every one is weary of it, are oftentimes contented to accept a very crude and even distasteful bill. Like some young gentlemen who propose and get refused three or four times, they are at last quite ready to accept something far less attractive than that they sought in the first instance.

Now, Mr. President, I desire to call attention to the second section in relation to the reserves. The Senator from Ohio farthest from me [Mr. THURMAN] seems to think that this will operate so as to be as great a burden upon the banks as it would be to have the entire 15 per cent. reserve. I differ with the Senator from Ohio. There will be nothing redeemed at the Treasury Department except old, worn, and mutilated bills. That is all that will be done in the way of redemption so long as we are not to reduce the volume of legal-tenders and no steps are taken toward specie resumption. Under such circumstances, of course the entire amount of reserves save what is deposited at the Treasury of the United States will be at once let loose and thrown upon the country, and, as the Senator from Indiana has properly said, it is to that extent so much expansion. I thought that many Senators here were pledged that they would not go for anything in the way of positive expansion, and it is obvious to us all that this must result to that extent in so much direct expansion.

Mr. MORTON. I would call the Senator's attention to the fact that the 5 per cent. in the Treasury is not a part of the reserve on circulation, but to be counted as part of the reserve required by law to be kept on deposits, so that the entire reserve in circulation is set free.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. That is the way I understand it. But, Mr. President, there is another provision in this bill, and that is in relation to the $382,000,000 of United States notes. That is now to be the legal amount of legal-tenders that are to be issued and kept in circulation. Here again is another large amount of positive expansion, to the extent of perhaps $26,000,000. I understand, perhaps not by authentic information, but at the same time I have heard that a considerable number of millions of the $26,000,000 that were outstanding have been redeemed and are now in the Treasury. This provision will require that even what has been redeemed for the last month or two shall be reissued.

Mr. WRIGHT. Will the Senator from Vermont allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Certainly.

Mr. WRIGHT. I will preface it by stating that I understand that the $26,000,000 at one time was issued, and therefore the maximum volume outstanding was $382,000,000 at one time. The amount over $356,000,000 was issued either legally or illegally. If it was illegal, then it was improperly out; but it was issued under a claimed power of the Secretary of the Treasury to issue it. That being so, and the Department putting that construction upon the statute, is it not better that we settle this thing one way or the other and say what shall be the legal volume of outstanding legal-tenders? That is all it is proposed to do in this section, to settle the question so that the Treasury cannot legally, according to the Senator's theory, issue more of this money. It has been outstanding; it is outstanding yet, as far as I know; and we merely say that that shall be the volume.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It is of course better to settle the question, but it is far better that it should be settled right. I never had a doubt but what that was issued improperly, to say the least.

Mr. THURMAN. Will my friend allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Certainly.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator, if I apprehend his remarks aright, says that this bill would liberate some of the greenbacks that are now in the Treasury, some of the $26,000,000 that were issued last fall, and that have now found their way back to the Treasury. Pray how can they get out of the Treasury unless there is some debt to pay; and if you do not pay debts with these greenbacks, what do you pay the debts in?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. They could get out of the Treasury in various ways besides paying for our current expenses. They could be set apart as a portion of the sinking fund.

Mr. President, there is a confession on the part of the Senator from Indiana that entirely justifies me in voting against this conference report. He has announced that it is not a settlement of any of the questions here except as to the matter of justice in the redistribution of the banking circulation held by States now having an excess. Under these circumstances, as this proposition takes no step toward specie resumption but seems to banish it entirely for the present and for the future, and instead largely provides for inflation, I feel that I cannot vote for the bill.

There is one thing more in relation to the last section. It seems to me that this provision for a redistribution of $55,000,000 ought to have had some limitation; that this threat over the banks of the North and the East should not be held as a perpetual terror over them; that if the States deficient in banking capital should not call for it say within two or three years, that after that time they should be required to forever hold their peace. I am quite willing to give the States that are deficient an opportunity to take any amount of banking capital that they desire, rather than to flood the country with irredeemable paper; but I do think that it is unfair to hold this measure impending forever over these banks in the North and East because they cannot properly do business and risk the withdrawal of their circulation at any moment. They cannot safely discount the same class of paper; they must only discount paper on call; and under such circumstances it seems to me that it is very unfair not to fix some time when this provision shall expire.

I do not desire to discuss the question at length. We have had a sufficient amount of discussion upon it heretofore, and but for the provisions in the bill which provide for at least fifty or sixty million dollars of actual expansion, I should most certainly have voted for it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana is quite right, as he generally is, when he says that this is to be taken, not as a finality, not as what the country requires, but as a mere temporary expedient, if I did not misunderstand him. Of course, those who are to vote for this bill do not expect that the subject of paying the debts of this country, as it was promised they should be paid, is going to be put forever out of view by the passage of this measure which has not anything to do with it. I suppose the Senator means something more; that is, he means that those people like himself who are in favor of having more promises to pay before we redeem those that we have already put out, are not to regard this as a finality. So be it, Mr. President. That question ought to be in order at all times until it is finally settled. But I can do him the justice and the committee the justice to say that I do not think this particular report touches that question either way. It has been found that Congress could not harmonize its views in respect to the other question, and that it can, as is supposed, on this precise one of banking alone.

The Senator has said that as this is a bill only for redistribution, it is an act of tardy justice to States that were shorn—that was his language—of their just proportion of banking facilities. What were the shears that clipped that wool? Was not there freedom in Indiana when the act of 1864 was passed? What prevented the people of Indiana from having their share? Were they excluded by military power? Were they excluded by any illegal action of the Secretary of the Treasury, or by any undue haste on the part of anybody? Not at all. They were not shorn, Mr. President. They had offered to them an opportunity to engage in the business of banking by furnishing capital to assist in carrying on the war. They did not furnish the capital to assist in carrying on the war in that way because they did not choose to do so. They did everything they thought patriotism required to assist in carrying on the war and they did it nobly and bravely and well; but it did not appear to them that it was for the interest of capital in the State of Indiana to engage in that particular business. It was otherwise occupied, more profitably to them. Therefore I must respectfully dissent from the judgment of the Senator from Indiana that the people of his State or of any other State were shorn of any part of this circulation. As I live in a wool-growing State, according to our notions of shearing it is taking a fleece off an animal that already has it; and therefore I do not think the Senator is right in the imputation, because it amounts to that, of robbery, shearing, that there have been circulations denied to the people of his State and the West by the people of the East or anywhere else. It is incorrect. Perhaps it was only a flourish of speech, and designed only to say that the people of the West did not obtain the amount of banking facilities which they were then entitled to and might have had had they chosen, and which they are now, as it is supposed, ready to take. If that is what the Senator means, very well; but if he means the people of Indiana or of any other State to believe that the people of the Eastern States have been shearing their brothers in the West of either circulation or rights, then I beg the Senator from Indiana to believe that I totally disagree with him; that the law and the history of these transactions is the other way. That, to be sure, does not touch the question much of what we are willing to do and what ought to be done now. I only refer to it to repel what might be implied from the phrase which the Senator from Indiana chose to adopt in describing what it appeared to him had been the state of affairs.

Mr. President, the question recurs, not whether the West shall now be entitled to take its proportion of banking circulation if it has the capital that it chooses to employ in it, because everybody agrees to that, not that they have an innate right to do now what they declined to do then, but so far as my constituents are concerned, out of good will and good feeling, we are ready to give up the full proportion that our friends in the West may want to make the thing even now, although we are far from seeing it as the Senator seems to do, that we committed any wrong on our friends in Indiana or elsewhere in taking banking circulation at the time and in the way we did. But that has gone by. The question to which I adverted was, and upon which solely as it respects this subject I vote against this conference report is, that it violates the fundamental principle upon which the national banking act of 1864 was founded—the fundamental banking principle I mean—which was to furnish what is called a sound system of banking to the people of this country.

The Senator from Indiana says that we get rid on this question of the reserves of the banks, of a cast-iron reservation or rule which had no elasticity, and therefore had no value to accommodate itself to the circumstances and the pressures of occasion as it should arise. Is the Senator right about that? Is he right in saying that this money so held in reserve could not be paid out? The Senator is not right; he is wrong. It could not be paid out upon loans, but it could be paid out either to meet demands for redemption of circulation, or, what is more to the purpose so long as the credit of the Government is good, to meet demands by daily depositors, so that the mechanic who in a panic wishes to draw his funds from a bank where he has deposited them for safe-keeping might be able to go to that bank with some probability that the law had directed the bank to keep itself in such a condition that it could meet the demand he was to make upon it.

Now, Mr. President, in order that there may be no misunderstanding about this subject, I ask the Secretary to read the first part of the thirty-first section of the national-banking act.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 31. And be it further enacted, That every association in the cities hereinafter named shall at all times have on hand, in lawful money of the United States, an amount equal to at least 25 per cent. of the aggregate amount of its notes in circulation and its deposits; and every other association shall at all times have on hand, in lawful money of the United States, an amount equal to at least 15 per cent. of the aggregate amount of its notes in circulation, and of its deposits. And whenever the lawful money of any association in any of the cities hereinafter named shall be below the amount of 25 per cent. of its circulation and deposits, and whenever the lawful money of any other association shall be below 15 per cent of its circulation and deposits, such association shall not increase its liabilities by making any new loans or discounts otherwise than by discounting or purchasing bills of exchange payable at sight, nor make any dividend of its profits, until the required proportion between the aggregate amount of its outstanding notes of circulation and deposits and its lawful money of the United States shall be restored.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Indiana will see and the Senate will see that the very object, the literal object of this provision in the bank act of 1864, which then met the approval of everybody as being one of the cardinal securities of this banking system, was that this percentage of reserve should be held available for the purposes of meeting demands upon the deposits in the bank and upon its circulation, and that the bank was not forbidden to pay it out for these purposes. It was only forbidden to make loans and discounts when the amount of its lawful money should have gone down to that minimum, and was required to continue to pay it out to depositors and to people holding its bills until the last dollar of it should be gone; and yet the Senator says that this is a cast-iron regulation that really locks up that amount of money and keeps it there so that the community cannot have benefit from it! I am amazed at the statement of the Senator. I am sure he must have forgotten how carefully the thirty-first section of this act of 1864 provided for a reserve of this money to meet the demands made from day to day upon it by its depositors and bill-holders when a pressure in the state of affairs of the country should require the people who had deposited money to get their money out in order that it might be paid upon their debts.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me a word?

Mr. EDMUNDS. With pleasure.

Mr. MORTON. The section quoted by the Senator exactly carried out the idea as I expressed it. If the reserve on the circulation is impaired by drafts upon it for redemption, it must be made good. If the reserve on deposits is impaired, that is to be made good; but as the reserve on circulation has never been impaired, and is not likely to be impaired by drafts upon it for redemption, therefore it has been in contemplation of law a permanent reserve. That is what it is now. It carries out my idea, I think, precisely.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am very sorry that the Senator does not understand this section yet. I beg him to be kind enough to take the statute and to run his eye over it. He will then see that the statute does not make a reserve for circulation and another reserve for deposits; it is one single reserve. I wish to have the Senator hear me, because I know if I can convince him, then I shall have convinced all, and that when I conquer Cæsar I shall have captured Rome. Therefore, I hope I shall be excused for asking the Senator to give me the honor of his attention for a single moment in reply to his own question and his own observation.

Now, I beg the Senator to look at the statute and he will see that there is not one reserve for circulation and another for deposits. There is one single reserve, a totality, an entire sum of 15 per cent., made up of two elements. Fifteen per cent. of the circulation, supposing that to be $100,000, and 15 per cent. of the deposits, supposing them to be $100,000, is a reserve of $30,000. That sum of money—not 15 per cent. to answer circulation and 15 per cent. to answer deposits, but that total sum of money equal to 15 per cent. both of circulation and deposits, is to be held against all loans and subject to the demand of the depositors or to the demand of the bill-holders, as the case may be. Now suppose, as the Senator says, the bill-holder does not come at all——

Mr. MORTON. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend will pardon me until I answer this question first. What then? Then there are $30,000 in bank which the bank is authorized and directed to hold to answer deposits, and the bank would be bound to pay out every dollar of the $30,000 on the demand of its depositors, and could not loan a cent of it whenever the time came when the depositors came and demanded the money; and if there was no demand from the bill-holder, so much the better for the depositor.

Now I will hear the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. MORTON. I was going to suggest that the Senator's rule holds out the same idea. It requires under the law a reserve in the Treasury of 15 per cent. for circulation, and as long as the bank circulation is outstanding the bank is required under the law to keep that amount of reserve on circulation, and if it is found to be impaired it is to be made good under the section which my friend read. Now, what difference does it make?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let me ask the Senator a question, and then he can tell me the difference, or tell the Senate. Suppose a bank has $30,000 of reserve and $100,000 of deposits. There is no demand by the bill-holder at all. A panic occurs. The depositors run in and draw their money from hour to hour until the bank has got down to $15,000. Is it lawful for the directors and the president of the bank to say to the depositors "We cannot pay you any more; this other $15,000 we have got left is for the bill-holder?"

Mr. MORTON. No, sir; it is not lawful, because they are bound to pay all their debts, and have no right to repudiate as to any part of them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So they are; and therefore if it is not lawful for them to hold on to that $15,000, it is their duty to pay it out. If they do pay it out the depositor gets it and applies it to his debt. That is precisely as I understand it in the East—I do not know how it is in the West—what a bank is instituted for, for the purpose of paying back the money to the depositors when they call for it.

Mr. MORTON. Let me ask my friend, is the liability of the bank confined to the extent of the reserve, so that when the reserve is exhausted it need not pay any longer?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not at all.

Mr. MORTON. That answers the whole question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It may answer it to the comprehension of the Senator; that is his affair; but whether it will answer it to the comprehension of honest and intelligent men is another question. The bank is bound to pay everybody; no one disputes that. The Senator mistakes the means for the end. We are on the question of means, and the question is whether we shall authorize a bank to spread all its money by loans, or whether we shall require the bank to keep some portion of it to meet those people who have loaned money to it and not to accommodate those people who wish to borrow money from it. Can the Senator see the difference between those two cases? I assume that he can. If he can, then I take it we have the case precisely where I put it to him before, that this statute is intended to preserve the public who are the depositors, so that they may have some hope to that extent in a time of pressure and panic of going to the bank and getting the little funds they had deposited; and the statute provided for both classes of the creditors of the bank, the bill-holders, and the depositors. The bonds deposited, as the Senator has said, ordinarily furnish good security for the bill-holder and he does not go for his money upon his bill. What then? Then there is just so much more money left on deposit in the bank which it is not authorized to loan; that the depositor has, if the bank is honest and pays it to him, to draw against to keep up his own credit.

That being the state of the case, this bill as reported by the conference committee turns around and says: We have been proceeding upon a false principle of banking all the time; when we have required that a bank shall hold itself strong, as we call it, by law to meet any run upon it, we have made a mistake; we will diminish by one-half, or by two-thirds, or by nine-tenths, as the amount of deposits may make it, the security that the depositor had before for the return of his money; we will authorize the bank to loan everything that is left with it, capital, deposits, and all down to 15 per cent., and that is all the sum of money that we will require the bank to keep to meet the demands upon it in the time of a run. Where is your depositor? He has not got any security by the bonds left in the Treasury. When he goes for his money the bank tells him "Congress authorized us to loan all the money you left with us except 15 per cent., and it is gone." The bill-holder turns around and says, "I have got my security; I am all right;" but the depositor, instead of having, as the law now gives him, this chance at 15 per cent. of the capital as well as of the deposits of the bank, is by this bill shorn (to borrow the expression of the Senator from Indiana and rightly apply it) of one-half of the security that the existing law has provided for him, in order that the bank may push out its loans and encourage enterprise and speculation, as it is called, until it has got nothing to meet its deposits but its bills receivable; and let me ask Senators what bills receivable are good for in a moment of panic? Of what value were the bills receivable of the banks on the 23d of September last, if that was the day, and for a month afterward?

Mr. SHERMAN. They were of as much value as the reserves on circulation, because they were deposited in New York and could not be drawn upon.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator is a little mistaken there, although he does not answer the question. He says they were of as much value as the reserves. Does the Senator mean to say that the deposits in the banks of New York were not more secure than the general loans of the banks?

Mr. SHERMAN. I know that the banks in Cincinnati whose deposits were in New York could not draw their deposits until they did draw from their bills-receivable at home enough to maintain themselves, and did actually resume payment of all their depositors before New York paid a single draft.

Mr. MORTON. And it was so all over the West.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Well, I know that in Burlington the banks were able to draw their deposits from the city banks and went on with their business. There is the difference between the two places. There is no criticism to be made upon that; I do not speak of it for that purpose. I only say that in a general way—undoubtedly there are exceptions—the deposits of the country banks in the city banks during the panic were a more available resource to meet the demands of depositors than were the bills receivable of the banks scattered all over the country. Neither of them was any too good it must be admitted; and I heartily concur in that part of this report which provides that the country banks shall not keep their reserves in the city banks. I was never in favor of their doing that. If this conference committee had reported that provision and had then left the reserve of 15 per cent. on the total capital and deposits, I should have said that they had made an improvement upon that conservative hand which legislation must have upon banking corporations and associations if they mean to protect the people, and would have given us a better banking system than we have now.

But, instead of that, what the committee have gathered in one hand they have scattered like sand from the other. They have given away, in my judgment, that wholesome security for the poor people and depositors of this land, the majority of whom deposit small sums of money in country banks, taking them all together—they have given away the wholesome and conservative security designed for and indispensable to their benefit, in order that there might be loaned out for purposes of enterprise and speculation every dollar that a bank had excepting this 15 per cent. of deposits. There is the objection; and I prophesy, although I do not seek for fame on the ground of prophetic voice, that adopting this, as no doubt you will, and standing to it as perhaps you will, you will find when the next panic comes, and it certainly will come as we all know, that you have destroyed one of the chief securities that the creditors of the banks of this country had; and you will then I think regret that you have aided by this degree in inflating enterprise and speculation at the expense of enabling depositors to draw from their banks on demand the sums of money which they have entrusted to them.

That is what I fear. It may be that I am wrong. When I see the honorable Senators from Ohio and from Indiana shake their heads, so much fuller of the wisdom that comes from coin and from currency combined, I feel that there is great doubt about what I say; but when I look at the little human experience that I have had and the little human observation that I have had and the little that I know of the history of the principles of banking, I cannot help entertaining humbly for myself the opinion that by just the degree that you allow banking corporations to withdraw from their vaults the money which depositors have placed there, by that same degree you injure the security of depositors, and so by the same degree you injure the community of which they are a part.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I have heard with no little surprise, and more regret, the remarks submitted by the Senators from Vermont. We have been fighting here for nearly six months, two contending parties—on the one side the inflationists, on the other side those who were opposed to inflation. Among those most steadily opposed to inflation were the two Senators from Vermont. They have told us from the first, they have said to the South and the West "There is no necessity for inflation; there is no necessity to enlarge banking facilities; we can give you all the banking facilities you want by a redistribution of the currency, and we are ready at any moment to do it;" and now when for the first time we have a bill which can pass and become a law, which does redistribute the currency, and does offer to the South and the West their fair proportion of it, the Senators from Vermont are found opposing that bill. It is true they say they are not opposed to the redistribution feature of it, but how easy it is to find something to which to take exception, and if there is an exception to be taken to every little feature that may be in this bill in order to destroy it, do those Senators believe that entire confidence will be placed by the country in their statement that they are in favor of or are willing to submit to this redistribution of the currency? We know that they are in earnest in what they say, but how will it be regarded all over the country but that it was a hollow promise, a hope held out to the ear but never intended to be fulfilled?

Now, pray, what are the objections to this bill? Certainly there are serious objections to it in my mind; it is not such a bill as I would have. But what, pray, are the features in it that are so seriously objected to by the Senator from Vermont nearest me, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] and who has taken nearly an hour to develop them here to the Senate? Why, that this bill proposes to abolish what is called the reserve upon circulation, and that, says the Senator from Vermont, will lessen the amount of the reserve for the security of depositors; and he seems to be prodigiously alarmed lest depositors in national banks shall lose their deposits. When did the national banks get so shaky? When, in the opinion of the Senator from Vermont, were they so weak-kneed that if you abolish this reserve, which was intended as a reserve upon circulation—for it is precisely so in the charter—their depositors will not be safe? Is the Senator prepared to advertise the people of the United States that the national-banking institutions of this country are so frail as that, so fragile as that?

Why, sir, in regard to this thing of a reserve to meet deposits, I tell you there are no banks in this country that can stand a run of their depositors if all the banks are run upon at the same time. In the nature of things they cannot do it, reserve or no reserve.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask him whether they cannot stand it better just in proportion to the amount of money they have in their vaults?

Mr. THURMAN. Your reserve will be exhausted in twenty-four hours. It does not help them a bit.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If you had double the amount it would last forty-eight hours, would it not?

Mr. THURMAN. But you do not require a reserve, and nobody talks about a reserve equal to the amount of the deposits. Look at the amount of the deposits of your national banks. They are about $800,000,000, more than twice the amount of the national-bank notes, more than the whole paper currency of the country; and that is simply the amount of the deposits of the national banks. Now add to that the deposits in other banks, private banks, savings-banks, and all the various institutions that receive deposits, and see whether they can stand a run by their depositors. They never did and never will in the world. What did they do last fall? We know very well that they suspended. The system of certified checks we know was practical suspension.

The idea that it is necessary to keep this reserve of 15 per cent. more in order to secure the depositors has no foundation whatever. I believe there are now more deposits in private banks and savings institutions than there are in the national banks. Where is the security for them, pray? The multitude of private banks in the country that receive deposits and have hundreds of millions of deposits, where is the security for them? And yet they fail just about as seldom as national banks fail; they are found to be just about as good.

This whole system of reserve for the protection of circulation or the protection of depositors in national banks is a delusion unless it is a reserve of coin to compel the payment in specie of the notes of such institutions. There is some sense in such a reserve as that. When you compel your banks to pay their notes in specie on presentation there is some sense in requiring them to have always on hand a certain quantity of coin with which to make redemption. But so far as this question of redeeming their notes is concerned, the reserve for which is abolished by this bill, in my judgment there never was any necessity whatsoever for that reserve and there is no harm done by its abolition, except (and I think that is going to be very trifling indeed) the little inflation that may take place by that abolition—a very trifling matter indeed, less I think than the Senator from Indiana has stated to be the result of his calculations.

But I do not wish to argue this matter further. Now I say to my honorable friends from New England, there are a few of us from the West who have stood in the same ranks with you and stood there at more peril of condemnation than you have encountered, by far, for you encountered none, and we have been fortified by your promise that there should be this redistribution of the currency. Now I say to you that if upon one pretext or another you destroy the fulfillment of that promise, then we shall have some right to complain.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio what he means by "one pretext or another?"

Mr. THURMAN. I know this: There never was a bill drawn on the face of this earth, not even by the Senator from Vermont himself, in which he could not find some fault. I utterly despair of there ever being a bill to which the Senator from Vermont would not find some objection, where he would feel hurt if I were to call it a pretext.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Well, Mr. President, I am not much wiser than I was before, which is saying a good deal after I hear the Senator from Ohio. The Senator seems to have warmed himself up to the notion that he has hitherto been in a false position, and that the best way to get out of it now is to accuse somebody in New England, and particularly me, of having a "pretext." I honor the judgment of the Senator. The best reason I have heard for going for this report is that one humble Senator from Vermont is guilty of making a "pretext." All hail to that wisdom of western statesmanship which conquers a reluctant Senate to go for a thing which stands before us in violation of all parliamentary law on the ground that one Senator has been starting a "pretext!" If that is not heroism for you, I do not know what is.

The Senator calls it a "pretext!" What pretext have I put forward? I asked the Secretary to read the thirty-first section of the act of 1864, which said a certain definite thing should be done. Was that the "pretext?" I suppose not. What then? I then said that we ought to stand upon the principles of that section. Is that what the Senator, with the wealth of learning that characterizes him, understands to be a "pretext?" I think not.

Mr. President, my honorable friend from Ohio in his present enthusiasm I think has a little forgotten himself, if he will pardon me for saying so, and that after all, passing the witticism, and it was not I must confess an extraordinary one, that he perpetrated at my expense, that nothing can be found that I do not find fault with—passing that, I think the Senator on reflection will conclude that there has not been much "pretext" about this particular business, at least east of the Alleghanies. We have had, to be sure, a good deal of pretty broad talk from some Senators on the subject of the value of specie payments, on the subject of the value of coin as the only just basis of commercial enterprise and of corresponding equivalents. I do not mean to say that there has been any "pretext" in that sort of thing. I do not mean to say that anybody standing on the top of the Rocky Mountains has been looking for votes on the shores of the Atlantic by occupying such altitudes. I do not think anybody has; but I think that those Senators who ask for themselves some respect for the fidelity of their own opinions ought to be willing to be generous enough to allow other people occasionally in this land of liberty also to have an opinion of their own, without being terrified into the notion that it is a "pretext." If I am wrong in demanding so much, then of course I ask the Senate and the Senator to excuse me.

But, Mr. President, I wish to state to the Senator from Ohio that I have voted, as he has, steadily to give our western friends the opportunity which they never have exercised when there has been circulation at the Comptroller's office that they could have, and when there is yet, to take it, to give them more, all that they ask. I intend to vote so again upon the bill that is on your Calendar for that purpose. But when a committee of this body, with whom is put in charge a question that has not anything to do with redistribution, but has to do with what I consider to be the safety of every community in this country in respect to compelling banks to keep themselves strong, I shall take the liberty, pretext or no pretext, to give the reasons why I think the committee in this instance in departing from the settled wisdom of the act of 1864, and declaring, as the Senator does in principle, that there is no use in any reserves at all, are wrong; and if there is any treason in that, to quote an old saying, the Senator from Ohio or anybody else is at liberty to make the most of it.

I should be glad to ask the Senator from Ohio, who talks about "pretexts," how this provision for redistribution got into this bill at all? Was it in the House bill that came to this body?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; but not for actual redistribution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Ohio is speaking a little too soon. Was it in the bill of the House that came to this body and went to that conference committee? No, sir; it was not. Was it in the amendments of the Senate that were sent to the House and disagreed to and that went to this committee? No, sir; it was not. Where, then, did this committee, in whom we reposed the duty of harmonizing those two bills, pick up this stray sheep from the flock, I should be glad to know, and who gave them the authority, I should be glad to be informed, to bring any such subject as this before us in this conference report? Why, Mr. President, in the good old times of Andrew Jackson, to which my friend from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] is so apt to refer, in that golden age of the Republic, a conference committee that should have undertaken to bring in a proposition of this kind upon a bill that was pending between the two Houses would have been ruled out on a point of order.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Will the Senator allow me to explain?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, sir; not at this present moment.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. It is on the point the Senator is stating as to the action of the committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator will be kind enough to wait a moment, and then I will hear him.

It would have been ruled out on a point of order, not on what the Senator might call a technical point of order, and the good sense of the Senate would have said that it was due to the independence of both Houses and to the rights of every Senator and member that the conferees of the two Houses should be confined to the subject that was at issue between them.

But, Mr. President, I make no point of order about this conference report. That is not the point at all. I took the liberty to express, when I was up before, my approval of that part of it. I am perfectly willing, as I have said a thousand times, that this redistribution should be made; but I do not want to be told, because on another part of this proposition, totally distinct from the question of redistribution, but touching the rights and duties of banking everywhere, I do not happen to agree with these new charmers, who keep serpents, and who overthrow the principles of the act of 1864, that I am guilty of resorting to "pretexts" in order to evade this provision for redistribution. The Senator has only to move to take up his distribution bill, or the distribution bill—it is not his in particular—and he will get my vote for it, and he may put it at thirty, forty, fifty, or sixty, or whatever number of untold millions it is that the Senator from Indiana speaks of as being due to the West, and he shall have my vote for it.

Mr. STEVENSON. May I ask the Senator from Vermont a question?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEVENSON. If a portion of the matter which was referred to us repealed the redistribution act, would not that give us jurisdiction to suggest not only the redistribution, but an increase of it?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I doubt it very much.

Mr. STEVENSON. I can only say to the Senator, whose experience is very much larger than mine, that I think the usage of the Senate and of Congress justify the committee in the exercise of that power.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, Mr. President, allow me to say, because I want to yield to my friend from Michigan in a minute——

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I wanted to call the attention of the Senator to the very point to which my colleague on the conference committee has called his attention—that that question was before the committee, submitted through the clause of the bill of the Senate repealing the act for the withdrawal of the $25,000,000, and therefore it was within the boundary of the controversy the adjustment of which was referred to us.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us see. Will the Senator be kind enough to read any part of the House bill or of the Senate amendments which contains any such provision? I know it was brought in by another committee of conference, but I do not remember it in the bill.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I have not the bill before me, but I state the fact, and the Senator's ingenuity is so fruitful that I presume he will recall to his attention the fact that it was in the bill since it was part of the project to withdraw circulation from New England in case we adjusted the currency question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Well, Mr. President, I seem to be guilty again. First, this conference report ought to be adopted because I am guilty of "pretexts;" second, because I am "fruitful of ingenuities." Now, if there is any other good reason for this, I think the Senate ought to be told it, because all Senators may not be willing to vote on those two grounds alone.

Mr. WRIGHT. I was going to suggest to the Senator from Vermont that a reference to the bill as passed by the Senate and as it went to the House will show distinctly that there was a provision in it repealing that clause.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us see what there is in it now. I had the impression that the committee would be able to refer me to the clause at once in one or the other of these bills, as they have had them under incubation for some time.

Mr. SHERMAN. You will find it in the third section, I think.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I shall find it in the third section, shall I?

Mr. SHERMAN. In the section for free banking. I think that is it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We will see. The chairman of the Committee on Finance says that this repealing clause is in the third section. I will read the third section:

SEC. 3. That sections 31 and 32 of the said act be amended by requiring that each of the said associations shall, within ninety days after the passage of this act, and thereafter, keep its lawful-money reserves within its own vaults, at the place where its operations of discount and deposit are carried on. And all the provisions of the said sections requiring or permitting any of the said associations to keep any portion of its lawful money reserves elsewhere than in its own vaults, or requiring or permitting the redemption of its circulating notes elsewhere than at its own counter, except as provided for in this act, are hereby repealed.

The Senator must be mistaken. That is not it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I tried to correct you and tell you it was in the section in regard to free banking.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not hear you.

Mr. SHERMAN. I thought I would wait until you got through. It is in the section which requires free banking. If the Senator will give the bill to me I will show it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do you mean of the Senate amendments?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir. The section which repeals certain acts, among the rest that one.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes; here is the clause undoubtedly to which the Senator from Ohio intended to refer. If I read the wrong section, it was through his misinformation, because he certainly said the third section unless I am very much mistaken. Here in the fourth section is a clause which provides—

That section 22 of the said act, and the several amendments thereto, so far as they restrict the amount of notes for circulation under said acts, be, and the same are hereby, repealed—

And then it goes on to repeal other sections—and the proviso in the third section of said act limiting the circulation of banks authorized to issue notes redeemable in gold coin to $1,000,000; and section six—

I think that must be it—

of said act, relating to the redistribution of twenty-five millions of circulating notes, be, and the same are hereby, repealed—

That is what the Senator refers to—that every association hereafter organized shall be subject to, and be governed by, the rules, restrictions, and limitations, and possess the rights, privileges, and franchises, &c.

Instead of bringing in a bill on these two bills which should regulate steps toward the resumption of specie payments, which should regulate free banking, and which, providing free banking as a substitute for other points in the controversy that we have had, contained a clause repealing the sixth section of the act referred to, and instead of acting upon the repeal of that clause and leaving it repealed, or else declining to repeal it, the Senator says that to drop every other part of the bill and bring in a fresh bill for the redistribution of the currency is within the power of the conferees. I beg the Senator to remember that he ought to be a little cautious before he maintains that, because it may injure us hereafter.

But I do not want to spend any time, as I said, upon the subject of whether the conferees have exceeded their authority or not. I stated when I had the honor to address the Senate before, that I was in favor, without regard to whether this proposition was regularly before us or not, of doing whatever our western and southern friends desired to have done in the way of getting banking facilities if they want them. I ought to have said, as has been said by my colleague, and as I stated the other day, that there ought to be a limit of time to this business somewhere, that this ought not to be held up for a hundred years, because, as Senators will see, taking all the banks in the East, in order to be ready promptly and fully to answer this demand they must keep a reserve on hand in order to meet it as they honestly should, and just so far as they keep this reserve on hand for that purpose, just so far they contract their loans and discounts, and just so far, therefore, from the point of view taken by my friends in the West and South, they are doing an injury to the community, because when the money is once loaned by the banks, it does not stop on State lines; it does not stop on rivers or geographical boundaries; it goes where it is wanted, to pay for things that people desire to buy. That is all the criticism I have to make upon it.

I do not think, therefore, it is just in anybody to say that because I am not in favor of this conference report, destroying as I believe it does by one-half the fundamental principle found by every country and stated by every writer on banking to be for the security of the people who intrust their money to banks, I am using that as a "pretext" to avoid a redistribution of the currency. I say that whoever asserts that asserts that which is unjust to me and which is beneath the dignity of the cause that the honorable Senators represent. They should find some better reason than that for overcoming the suggestion I make that I believe in the law of 1864 regulating all banks, and which has no reference to distribution, that there should be security to the bill-holder and to the depositor also to the full extent required by that act.

Mr. HOWE. I do not rise to say a word in favor of the adoption of this report or against the adoption of it. I will try to be content with whatever the Senate does in that behalf; that is to say, if I am discontented with whatever the Senate does, I will try to bear that discontent as well as I can.

I want to say one word touching this question of distribution. I am one of those who never blamed the East for any share that it has obtained in this privilege of banking. That is a statutory privilege. I think it ought to be common to all. The wisdom of the law, however, decreed that it should be limited. It was distributed, and our friends in the Eastern States secured a share in that privilege quite disproportioned to their population or to their business. I never held them blamable for doing so. The States of the West and South secured a share of that privilege quite disproportioned to their business and to their population, much less than their population and business entitled them to. I never blamed the East for that result; but this morning I understand the Senator from Vermont to urge that the West and the South are to blame for not having secured more of this statutory privilege than they did.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have not said anything of the kind.

Mr. HOWE. I understood the Senator—if I misunderstood him I shall be corrected—to recite here as an evidence of the patriotism of the East that they came forward when war was abroad in the land and took up this banking circulation by way of aiding the Government; and that the West, not being as patriotic, held back and refused to take the share of that circulation which the statute entitled them to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I occupied no such position and stated no such proposition, the Senator will pardon me for saying, as he will find by looking at the RECORD to-morrow, which I never change or revise.

Mr. HOWE. Then I did misunderstand the Senator.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You did. I had no such idea.

Mr. HOWE. I am glad I misunderstood the Senator. Still I will take this opportunity to say, since I have gotten up under the influence of a mistake, that I do not think the State I represent is at all to blame for not having secured its full share of that statutory privilege. The State of Wisconsin had a banking system at the time you adopted the national banking system. By the constitution of that State she is prohibited from contracting a debt exceeding $100,000, except in time of war. When the war came on the State found it necessary to contract a larger debt than $100,000, did contract a debt to the amount of $2,000,000 in aid of the Government, in aid of the war, to enable the State to fit out and send its troops to the field. The banks of Wisconsin came forward and invested their capital in those bonds and put those bonds behind their circulation. When you proposed to tax the circulation of State banks 10 per cent., or tax them out of existence, you see that blow fell heavily upon the banks of the State of Wisconsin. I am inclined to think the banks of Wisconsin were just as patriotic when they purchased the bonds of that State issued in aid of the war as the banks of Vermont or of Massachusetts were when they purchased the bonds of the United States issued in aid of the same war.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator from Wisconsin permit me to make a statement bearing on this matter—I do not wish to get into this centroversy—which I think ought to settle the question about the relative patriotism of the East and West in taking the national-bank capital? I made an examination at one time on that subject, and prior to the battle of Gettysburgh, in July, 1863, which I believe is conceded as having turned the tide of events, there were not over thirty applications for national-bank charters from all quarters of the United States.

Mr. HOWE. Then, after all, it was not so very patriotic a movement.

Mr. SCOTT. I state the fact.

Mr. HOWE. I am sorry the Senator did not withhold that fact. I should have been glad to believe that the patriotism of all our friends in the East could be measured by the readiness, the cheerful alacrity with which they came forward and subscribed to these bonds and went into the banking business. I should not have protested against the justice of that standard at all, but I should protest against applying the same standard to the State of Wisconsin for the reasons that I was going on to state.

When the United States said to the several States "You must retire all your State bank issues," it involved the necessity on the part of Wisconsin bankers not merely of investing their capital in national bonds, but it involved the necessity of their withdrawing the same amount of capital which was then invested in the bonds of the State. That was a very heavy load for the banks to carry. Those bonds could not readily be converted when all the capital of the country was jumping to get national bonds. I remember to have stood here in the Senate to have resisted the passage of that law imposing the tax. I thought I was discharging but my simple duty to the bankers of Wisconsin in doing so; but while I stood here resisting it those bankers came forward voluntarily, having first invested their capital in the bonds of the State to aid the war, and in convention they agreed to retire those bonds and to invest their capital in the bonds of the nation. So I shall to-day and always protest that the reluctance on the part of the bankers of Wisconsin to come forward and invest in the national banking system is not to be construed here or anywhere as an evidence of any want of patriotism on their part.

Having said this much, I will take my seat, remarking once more that I care but very little what the Senate shall do with this pending measure. It has been remarked before that it does not meet any one of the necessities which hitherto we have all insisted were the necessities that confronted the country. Those two necessities were, first, that as the privilege of banking was a monopoly the monopoly ought to be uprooted, and second, that you have a large amount of national paper afloat, on its face payable on demand, but not paid in fact. The two labors we assigned to ourselves when we came here were, first, destroying this monopoly, and second, redeeming the national faith as it is borne on the face of these legal-tenders. Your bill ignores both these points. It proposes what you call a redistribution of the bank circulation. On that point I have simply to say what I have said repeatedly. If our friends of the East are perfectly willing to allow a redistribution, I accept it; I do not want to snatch at it; and if you give it to us I do not want you to make faces at us. If you think it is an act of justice due to the West and the South, then do justice and do it like men. If you think justice does not require it, then hold on to it. If you got no more than belongs to you, abide by that position. I cannot bear to accept this redistribution and then be taunted for doing so. I suppose if I was very hungry and entirely destitute of money, and my friend from Vermont was to offer me a quarter of a dollar to buy a lunch with, I should take it; but if I saw when he handed me the quarter of a dollar that he was going to spit at me as a beggar if I did take it, I would go hungry a little longer. So I think I will not snatch at this proffer that is now made to us. I will wait and see what the Senate will do about it. If they give it to us, I think I had better take care that the record shall show it was their act and not mine.

Mr. SCHURZ. I do not intend to prolong this debate, Mr. President; in fact I have neither the strength nor the disposition to do so; but I merely want to state in a few words my position with regard to this bill.

I expect this bill will pass Congress, and what I might say would have little effect either way. There are some provisions in it which I approve of; among others the redistribution of the currency—this for two reasons: In the first place it will, in part at least, remove that injustice which has grown up under the law as it now stands; and in the second place it will dispel some of the delusions which seem to exist here and there, especially in the Western and the Southern States. I should therefore gladly vote for that feature of the bill and desire it to become the law of the land. In fact I have voted several times for it. There are, however, other things in this bill, and especially one which will scarcely permit me to support this particular measure as a whole. The one I refer to particularly is this: This bill legalizes the issue of part of what was called the $44,000,000 reserve. I for my part with other Senators have always considered that so-called reserve no reserve at all, but upon conscientious investigtaion of that subject I have believed, and do now firmly believe, that the $44,000,000 were retired, canceled, destroyed, wiped out as part of the legal-tender circulation, and could not legally be put out again.

I hold also, as a logical consequence, that any ex post facto enactment legalizing the reissue of any part of those retired United States notes would amount virtually to a fresh issue of irredeemable paper currency as a legal tender in time of peace, which, looking at it from the point of view of constitutional power or of sound policy, I cannot give my assent to, directly or indirectly.

Conscientiously holding this view, I cannot vote for any measure pretending to legalize the reissue of any part of the so-called forty-four million reserve instead of providing for the retirement of the amount illegally issued.

Having paired off with the Senator from Illinois now absent, [Mr. LOGAN,] before he went West, upon all questions concerning finance, upon the assumption that he and I would naturally be on opposite sides, I shall have to abstain from voting.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I shall vote against this bill because it is direct expansion. There is some difference of opinion in relation to the propriety of keeping reserves when banks are upon a specie basis. I think myself that then it might be well left to the discretion of every banker. But here we have a national banking system which provides that banks in the country shall have 15 per cent. of reserve and in the cities 25 per cent. That has hitherto kept out of circulation about $100,000,000. Now it is proposed to obliterate that provision of law so far as the circulation is concerned; and that will, of course, throw that amount into circulation in addition to the sum that heretofore has been authorized. It is solely on the ground of this and the other provision in relation to legalizing what has been miscalled the reserve of $44,000,000 that I shall vote against the bill.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, at almost every step in this discussion for four or five months, to every request that has been made in behalf of free banking or for some extension of the national-bank currency, to give banking facilities to States that had not their full share or had not what they required, we have been met by the most liberal propositions to take twenty-five, forty, or fifty millions from the Eastern States—to take what we wanted. These offers have been made in a most magnificent manner from time to time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. MORTON. Allow me to go on. I always knew that so far as my State was concerned upon the basis of the distribution of the act of 1865, a redistribution would give Indiana but very little; it would not meet the demand and the necessity that exist there. But other States were in a different situation. I confess that when these generous offers were made from time to time I had a secret apprehension that if it should ever come to pass that a vote must be taken upon anything like fair distribution or approaching a fair distribution of this currency, the Senators who made these liberal and generous offers would find some unfortunate thing in the bill, that had crept in either by accident or in the night when nobody was looking after it, which would prevent them from voting for it. Now I shall await this vote with a great deal of interest to see whether my apprehension on that subject will be realized. My friend from Vermont said that he would vote for the other bill, the bill not before the Senate, but I should be afraid——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did vote for it.

Mr. MORTON. My friend voted for it under circumstances when he did not expect it to pass, and when there was no prospect of its passage; but now for the first time there is a prospect for the passage of a redistribution bill, and my friend finds good and sufficient reasons why he will vote against it, and I have always been afraid that he would.

But he says another thing. He does not admit that the law requires a redistribution or that the States of the West and South failed to get what they were entitled to under the law. He does not admit that; but he intimates that he is willing we should have this as a matter of favor, as a matter of compassion, a gratuity, like a toy thrown to a querulous or unhappy child. I do not believe any of the Western or Southern States want it upon that ground.

Now, what is the simple fact about it? When the first act was passed authorizing $300,000,000 of national-bank notes and providing for their apportionment among the several States upon a certain basis, the law contemplated that whatever was apportioned to any particular State should stand to the credit of that State until that State was prepared to take it, whether it was this year, or next year, or five years hence. But what was the result? After the law was passed and the system went into full operation, States in the West and South, owing to their condition resulting from the war and from other causes, were not prepared to step in and to take all of it the very first year, and a certain Treasury officer gave a construction to the law that enabled the Eastern States to come in and take what these Western States could not take of their own share the first year, and they did so. That is the whole of it. I do not blame the people of New England for it. I have said so repeatedly. A Treasury officer said they were entitled to it. I do not blame men of capital for coming in and taking it when they thought they could make their capital profitable by that kind of investment. But that did not change the right or change the law. And now we are told at this late hour, after ten years have passed by, when there is a prospect of the passage of a law making an imperfect distribution, now $25,000,000 short of what the Comptroller of the Currency reported is necessary to make a full distribution, we are told, "You are not entitled to it under the law, but we are willing you should have it, provided the other parts of the bill were right, which unfortunately they are not."

Mr. President, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] said that this is a measure of expansion. Well, to the extent that it liberates legal-tender notes which are now required by law to be held in the vaults of the banks, it is expansion, and $30,000,000 of old notes set free are a great deal better than $18,000,000 of new notes put into circulation. I have never been in favor of making new notes and putting them into circulation beyond the limit the law has fixed.

The Senator says further that it is expansion in this, that it requires the $382,000,000 of legal-tenders to be kept in circulation, and that some millions out of the $26,000,000 issued last fall have already been retired by the Secretary of the Treasury. If that is true, the country does not know it; but the threat of that retirement is hanging over the country, and perhaps more than almost any other cause depresses the business of this country. If some millions have already been retired, this law will requre them to go out, because the plain intention of this law is that the legal-tender circulation shall be $382,000,000, of course saving the necessary and ordinary currency balance in the Treasury, and the currency balance is always counted in the monthly statement as a part of the circulation, and justly so.

I am criticised for saying that this is not a finality. Do those Senators who have talked so long and so earnestly about specie payments contend that it is a finality? A law that will deny to the State of Indiana the right to establish banks of her own and will not give to her national banks—a great and growing State—can hardly be called a finality. I can say that here and now. We shall hear a great deal said about specie payments, the repeal of the legal-tender act, the hoarding of gold in the Treasury, and the selling of our bonds in Europe to get gold. I have no doubt all that is to be talked of before the people, as well as free banking and such enlargement of the bank system as will enable us to meet the developments of the nation.

This, Mr. President, is all I have to say.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana says that the original law provided that this distribution of banking facilities among the several States according to population and wealth, should be a perpetual provision which was to be set apart for the credit and benefit of the particular State and was never to be withdrawn from it. I should be very glad if the Senator from Indiana had pointed out to us any such provision in the act relating to the national banks. No doubt it is my ignorance, but I should be glad to have him or any member of the Committee on Finance or of this conference committee point out, what has never been asserted before, that the law provided this apportionment among the several States should be an apportionment made once forever, and that none of the currency should be issued except to the States who by that apportionment were to take it, whether they wanted it or not. There is not any provision of that kind in the statute that I ever heard of. If there is, I should be glad to hear some gentleman read it.

Mr. SHERMAN. The law of 1863 contained that provision; the law of 1864 did not, which I see the Senator has before him. The act of March 3, 1865, restored the old provision. If the Senator has the act of March 3, 1865, he will find that the old provision for distribution was restored; and that was long before there was any considerable issue in any of the States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator mean to say that the law provided that this currency should only be issued to the States in accordance with their wealth and population, and therefore that the issue to the States in excess of their proportions respectively on the basis of wealth and population was an illegal issue?

Mr. SHERMAN. I would prefer to show the Senator the statute.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator prefers not to answer the question; that is the short of it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will furnish the statute to the Senator.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator has been at the head of the finances of this nation legislatively for a good while, and I should be glad to have the country know from him whether when we were trying to carry on the war and pay off the debt that accrued out of it, and when some States did not or would not or could not come forward and get their bonds and take circulation, and thus furnish means to the Government to pay off its obligations, the law was invaded by the Secretary of the Treasury allowing other States that could to establish banks. Was that a violation of the statute? I want to know if the Secretary of the Treasury committed an act of such immense importance as that when the law set apart, as the Senator from Indiana says it did, to each one of the States a given quota which was to stand to its credit until the crack of doom, and leave the soldiers of this Republic to go unpaid for the want of currency to pay them in, to be got by the purchase of bonds and then their deposits here? I should be glad to know it. I should be glad to have it understood now, because it certainly ought to make a great difference in the judgment of just men all over the country in respect to this question of redistribution, whether you are merely correcting a gross irregularity and illegality of conduct on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury, and of robbery on the part of the States that took more than population and wealth pointed out for them to take in the first instance, or whether when a State which was offered that proportion declined to take it, it was lawful for a citizen of some other State to come forward and say: "I will take your bonds and give you the money to pay your soldiers." It is worth knowing; and as it has been boldly stated on this floor, I demand the authority of the statutes under which such an assertion is made. I should be glad to have the people be able to read such a statute, and have it appear in our debates. I never heard the Senator from Ohio say that that was the law. I never heard any person say it was the law until now, for the first time, it has fallen from the lips of the Senator from Indiana, who did not do us the honor to make any reference to the statute on which he relied for any such proposition. He said that that was the true construction of the law. I should be glad to see where the clause is in that law which bears that construction.

The Senator from Ohio says the act of 1864 did not contain it, but the act of 1865 did. I fail to see in the act of 1865 anything that contains it. Perhaps the Senator can reason it out. I will not take his time on that subject. He can do it himself. I beg leave to say that it is rather late in the day to put a construction of that character upon these statutes of the United States—rather late in the day, ten years afterward—to discover that this currency was put out illegally by the Secretary of the Treasury, and that you got your money to pay your soldiers with through a robbery committed by the Secretary of the Treasury and the people of the Eastern States upon the Western States in their purchasing of bonds and depositing them for circulation to do this thing with. It may be so, but it is a thing that has not been discovered until now.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not want to be drawn into this debate, but the Senator appealed to me as a member of the Committee on Finance, and I feel bound to read him the law. I find it in Brightley's Digest:

> And that $150,000,000 of the entire amount of circulating notes authorized to be issued shall be apportioned to associations in the States, in the District of Columbia, and in the Territories, according to representative population, and the remainder shall be apportioned by the Secretary of the Treasury among associations formed in the several States, in the District of Columbia, and in the Territories, having due regard to the existing banking capital, resources, and business of such States, District, and Territories.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suppose nobody doubts that that is the way the act of 1865 reads, and nobody doubts how the act of 1863 and the act of 1864 read. That is not the question. The question which the Senator from Onio does not answer is what in his judgment at the time, and what in his judgment now, and what in the judgment of everybody for the last ten years the honest interpretation of that statute is; and to that the Senator gives no answer. I could have read the statute myself; I had it in my hand. I said that I failed to discover in this statute authority for the assertion of the Senator from Indiana; that was all; and I asked Senators to point out how it meant that. That they do not do. But I am taking too much time about that; it is only incidental.

I only wish the Senator from Indiana, who impugns the honor and fidelity of Senators from the Eastern States on this subject of redistribution, to remember, as others will remember if he does not, that time after time in this Senate the Senators from the Eastern States at this session have voted solid in favor of a distinct proposition to be enacted into the form of a law for this redistribution unembarrassed by the poisonous sauce that this conference committee has surrounded it with and poured over it, but in a way that nobody could object to it upon the merits and nobody did; and the honorable Senator from Indiana and all forces that he could muster, enough to beat it, voted directly against it.

Mr. President, in that point of view I shall leave it to the future to determine whether it is the Senator from Indiana or whether it is I who history will pronounce to have acted the part of a demagogue upon this question. I do not say that either of us has. I only say in reply to the imputations of the honorable Senator that it may be determined hereafter when his acts and not mine, for he is great and I am humble, are drawn into public consideration—it will be for the future to determine how large the good faith and how large the direct fidelity to a straight and square object has been which has brought him to vote constantly against this proposition when it was not coupled with other things which have nothing to do with it, and which we believe to be injurious to the public welfare, has been consistent with the interest that he now seems to feel, and undoubtedly does feel, in favor of this redistribution which is to carry prosperity and greenbacks to the pockets of those who do not possess either.

Mr. SARGENT. In accordance with the general understanding of the Senate, the hour of four o'clock having arrived, I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. WRIGHT. Will not the Senator from California let us take the vote on this question?

Mr. SARGENT. If the debate stops and we can take the vote I will not object; otherwise I do object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the motion withdrawn?

Mr. SARGENT. Until the roll is called.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the report of the conference committee.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (H. R. No. 3168) making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SARGENT. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope the Senate will not go into executive session until they finish the river and harbor bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair asks indulgence of the Senate before putting the question on the motion for an executive session to dispose of business on his table.

Mr. SARGENT. I have no objection to that.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, communicating the official report of the delegates selected to represent the United States at the eighth session of the international statistical congress, held at Saint Petersburg in August, 1872, by invitation of the Emperor of Russia; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in obedience to law, the report of the surveyor-general of New Mexico on land grant to Francisco Montes Vigil, reported as private land claim No. 91, for the town of Alameda tract, in Bernalillo County, New Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

STATISTICAL ATLAS OF NINTH CENSUS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That the three thousand copies of the Statistical Atlas of the United States based on the results of the ninth census, now being compiled by Francis A. Walker, the publication of which is provided for by act of March 3, 1873, shall be distributed for public and official use as follows: twenty-five copies for the President; six hundred copies for the Senate; twelve hundred copies for the House of Representatives; two hundred and twenty-five copies for the State Department, and for transmission to United States legations and the more important consulates abroad, and to the legations of foreign governments in Washington; seventy-five copies for the Treasury Department; forty copies for the War Department; twenty-five copies for the Navy Department; twenty-five copies for the Department of Justice; twenty-five copies for the Department of Agriculture; six hundred copies for the Department of the Interior for its use and distribution among the executives of the several States, and libraries of literary institutions; sixty copies for the Library of Congress, State libraries, and one hundred copies for Francis A. Walker.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate agree to that resolution. It merely provides for the distribution of a book already ordered to be printed.

The resolution was considered and agreed to.

RAYMOND'S MINING REPORT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That of the report of R. W. Raymond on mining statistics, with the accompanying engravings, there be printed three thousand copies for the House, two thousand for the Senate, one thousand for the Treasury Department, and one thousand for the Commissioner.

EDUCATION REPORT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed twenty thousand copies of the report of the Commissioner of Education, five thousand of which number shall be for the use of the Commissioner, five thousand for the use of the Senate, and ten thousand for the use of the House of Representatives.

TRANSPORTATION REPORT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed six thousand copies of the report, with appendix and evidence of the Select Committee of the Senate on Transportation to the Sea-board, four thousand of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, and two thousand for the use of the Senate.

Mr. ANTHONY. We passed a resolution this morning for a different distribution of that document and the printing of a less number of the evidence.

Mr. SARGENT. I think it had better go to the Committee on Printing.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Printing.

AMENDMENTS TO AN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, submitted an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 3600) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. COOPER, Mr. BOUTWELL, Mr. STEVENSON, and Mr. MITCHELL submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them to the bill (H. R. No. 3600) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, submitted an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 3600) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

LOUISVILLE CUSTOM-HOUSE.

Mr. STEVENSON. If the Senator from California will yield the floor to me for a moment, I wish to report from the Committee on Appropriations a bill and ask that it be put on its passage.

Mr. SARGENT. I believe that will lead to no discussion.

Mr. STEVENSON. None.

The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2109) for the protection of the United States custom-house in the city of Louisville, Kentucky, have directed me to report it without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

The bill was read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The same principle that I acted upon this morning compels me to ask that that bill shall go over. If we are ever going to do anything with the Calendar, we must go to it.

Mr. STEVENSON. I ask that the bill be put on its passage. It is absolutely essential that this should be done.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What difference does it make whether it is done to-day or to-morrow?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 3762) to amend the act entitled "An act for the erection of a public building for the use of the United States in Atlanta, Georgia," was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 8) in regard to the lower pier at Chester, Pennsylvania, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 112) directing the Public Printer to keep an account of all expenditures for printing, mailing, and binding the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, &c., was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

The bill (H. R. No. 3761) directing the Secretary of the Treasury to report upon the necessity of a public building at the city of Auburn, New York, was read twice by its title.

Mr. FENTON. I ask that the Senate act on that bill now. It is merely a bill directing an inquiry, and is in a very few lines.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The same honor that I owe to other gentlemen compels me to stand by the Calendar.

Mr. FENTON. Then let the bill be referred.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The bill (H. R. No. 3477) for the relief of Nelson Tiffany was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (H. R. No. 3000) for the relief of Samuel W. Davidson, Henry Smith, John Gray Bynum, and others, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 113) making an appropriation for the purchase and restoration to the family of the Marquis de La Fayette of the watch presented to him by General Washington was read twice by its title.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I ask that that be put on its passage.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object.

The joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The bill (H. R. No. 3757) for the transfer of twenty condemned bronze cannon for the erection of a statue to the late Major-General George Gordon Meade, was read twice by its title.

Mr. SCOTT. I am requested by the gentlemen having in charge the erection of that statue to ask the immediate consideration of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (H. R. No. 2032) to amend the act entitled "An act to promote the development of the mining resources of the United States," approved May 10, 1872, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

The bill (H. R. No. 2700) amendatory of the act entitled "An act for the relief of the heirs and next of kin of James B. Armstrong, deceased," approved March 3, 1873, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

The bill (H. R. No. 3132) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver certain condemned ordnance to the municipal authorities of Lexington, Massachusetts, for monumental purposes, was read twice by its title.

Mr. WASHBURN. I hope that will not be required to be referred. It is merely allowing certain pieces of ordnance to be granted to Lexington as has been done in other cases.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Such bills have always been referred. I object for the same reason that I have done so before. I do not see why bills should be passed now when others reported long ago are waiting.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred as indicated below:

The bill (H. R. No. 3182) for the relief of the heirs of James Barnett, deceased—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (H. R. No. 3749) to provide for the reapportionment of the Legislative Assembly of Idaho Territory—to the Committee on Territories.

The bill (H. R. No. 3756) to appoint a commission to establish the rights of the former slaves in the Choctaw and Chickasaw countries, and their descendants, and to submit the same to Congress—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SARGENT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. I need not remind Senators that this motion is in accordance with an understanding arrived at a few days ago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from California.

The motion was agreed to. there being on a division—ayes 34, noes 7; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and forty minutes spent in executive session the Senate (at six o'clock p. m) took a recess till half past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at half past seven o'clock p. m. in executive session. After two hours and twenty-three minutes spent in the consideration of executive business the doors were reopened.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in some and non-concurred in other amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3094) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes; and agreed to other amendments of the Senate with amendments, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. J. N. TYNER of Indiana, Mr. J. B. PACKER of Pennsylvania, and Mr. S. S. MARSHALL of Illinois, managers at the same on its part.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had

A bill (H. R. No. 3748) directing the Secretary of the Treasury to report upon the necessity for a public building at Brooklyn, New York, and the cost of the same.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3600) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PRATT. I move to take up House bill No. 2190, being the bil amendatory of the act granting pensions to the soldiers of the war of 1812, &c.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope that bill will not be taken up. I hope the Senate will go on with the river and harbor bill and dispose of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) The Senator from Indiana moves to postpone the pending and all prior orders, and proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear that bill read.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope the motion of the Senator from Indiana will not prevail, and for this reason: We had a vote this morning, and a recess was taken and a session called for to-night for the express purpose of considering the pension bill, the bill which I understand the Senator from Indiana now proposes to call up.

Mr. PRATT. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAVIS. We came here this evening for that purpose. The subject was brought before the Senate this morning, and by a large vote, I believe by a majority of fifteen, the Senate determined to come here to-night for the purpose of taking up that bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have been striving ever since Monday morning at twelve o'clock to get action on the river and harbor bill. We now have one day more of the session, and it is absolutely certain that the river and harbor bill must go to a conference committee, and unless it is taken up now and perfected and passed to-night, there is very grave doubt whether it will pass at all. If the river and harbor bill has any friends here I trust they will stand by it. I hope the motion of the Senator from Indiana will not prevail, but that the friends of the river and harbor bill will stand by it. If it has no friends, let it go.

Mr. WEST. The House of Representatives having acted upon the amendments of the Senate to the post-office appropriation bill, concurring in some and non-concurring in others, and agreeing to others, with amendments, and asked for a conference, I move that the Senate insist on its amendments and agree to the conference, and that the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to know what the state of the question is on the post-office appropriation bill before we lump it in that way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana to postpone the pending and all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 2190.

Mr. WEST. I am aware of that; but I presume the Senate will entertain a motion to appoint a committee of conference at any time. It can be submitted to the Senate if it is necessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the motion made by the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I want to hear the communication from the House of Representatives read, if it is not offensive to the Senator, to know what it is that we are to have a conference about.

Mr. WEST. The Senator is very ingenious in finding offense. I do not find any offense.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will lay before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives in relation to the post-office appropriation bill.

The Chief Clerk read the action of the House of Representatives, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
June 19, 1874.

Resolved, That the House concur in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3094) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, numbered as follows: 1, 3, 4, 7, 9, 10, and 11.

That the House non-concur in the following numbered amendments, namely, 2, 5, 6, 13, 14, 15, 16, and 17.

That the House concur in the following amendments of the Senate to said bill, with amendments, as follows:

Eighth amendment.—After the word "publications" in line 6 of said amendment strike out the words "four cents" and insert "issued weekly and more frequently than once a week, one cent and five mills," and after the word "thereof" in line 7, insert "and on those issued less frequently than once a week, three cents for each pound or fraction thereof."

Twelfth amendment.—In line 1, after "Postmaster-General" insert "when in his judgment it shall be necessary," in line 17, after the word "do" insert "and shall thereafter without having taken such affidavit, deposit any newspapers in the mail for transmission," and in lines 21 and 22 between the words "any" and "person" and "any" and "matter," insert the word "such," and in line 24, after the word "done" insert "with the intent to avoid the prepayment of postage due thereon;" after the word "any" in line 25 insert "such," and in lines 29 and 30, strike out the words "less than $100 nor" and in line 31 strike out the words "three years" and insert "one year."

That the House ask a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on said bill.

Ordered, That Mr. TYNER, Mr. PACKER, and Mr. MARSHALL, be the managers of the conference on the part of the House.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should be glad to have the Senator in charge of this bill explain to us what are the open questions between the two Houses, in order that we may understand what it is we are to have a conference about. The Chair will remember that to-day we had some discussion on the matter as to whether the conferees on the currency bill acted within the line of their duty, and I think it quite desirable that we should know in this instance, not more than in any other, what it is we are submitting to a conference between the two Houses. The Senator from Louisiana can explain it to us, if he can be heard, I have no doubt in a very short time.

Mr. WEST. The only point involving an appropriation in the bill from which the House disagrees with the Senate is an amount of $700. So with respect to money that is the only difference. The main open question with regard to general legislation is the disagreement of the House of Representatives to the amount fixed by the Senate as postage upon newspapers, the House determining that one and one-half cents a pound shall be enough, but the Senate holding to the opinion that four cents a pound is proper. There are some minor matters in connection with the details of that difference, but nothing more than that, I understand.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the state of the question as respects transmitting the RECORD through the mails?

Mr. THURMAN. That is in amendment numbered 17. That is non-concurred in.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is open. What is the state of the other postage question as to the transmission of public documents already printed?

Mr. THURMAN. That is in the same section and non-concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the motion made by the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. WEST. That the Senate insist on its amendments non-concurred in by the House, disagree to the amendments of the House to other amendments of the Senate, and agree to the conference asked by the House.

The motion was agreed to; and by unanimous consent the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the committee of conference on the part of the Senate; and Messrs. WEST, RAMSEY, and SHERMAN were appointed the conferees.

AMENDMENT TO AN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CLAYTON. I desire——

Mr. STEVENSON. I rise to a question of order. The pending question, as I understand, is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana to take up the pension bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. But by unanimous consent the motion of the Senator from Louisiana was entertained.

Mr. STEVENSON. Only that. Now comes the Senator from Arkansas with a motion.

Mr. CLAYTON. I only desire to submit an amendment to an appropriation bill. I desire to give notice of an amendment to be moved to the bill (H. R. No. 3600) making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes.

The amendment was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Indiana to lay aside the pending and all other prior orders and proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 2190.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. May I inquire what the pending business is?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The river and harbor appropriation bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I believe that there seems to have been a pretty general understanding all along that the appropriation bills should take the precedence in the order of business, and we have arrived now at that late day of the session, almost in the last hours of the session, when if we do not observe that rule I am very sure we shall not be in a condition to adjourn on the 22d instant.

I have no right to know of course what the proposition is which is to supersede this appropriation bill, but I should regret extremely that it should be found necessary to displace an appropriation bill at this particular time, so late in the session, for any matter of legislation whatever. Unless the House of Representatives should change their position on the subject, we shall adjourn on the 22d instant. We have no right to know that we shall not. If after we have passed the appropriation bills, it shall be found that the public necessity is so great as to require further delay, that may be very well, but certainly we cannot afford for any general legislation whatever to postpone the consideration of an appropriation bill at this time of the session. To-morrow morning, or during the session of to-morrow, I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill, which is a large bill and will require a good deal of attention. It seems to me that the Senate cannot afford to lay aside the bill which the Senator from Michigan has under his charge.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Committee on Appropriations have already served notice on the Committee on Commerce that they will call up what is known as the omnibus bill to-morrow morning, and will antagonize it against the river and harbor bill, and I hope the Senate will to-night complete that bill. I ask the Senate to stand by the river and harbor bill.

Mr. STEVENSON. I gave notice the day before yesterday that I should ask for a night session to-night for this purpose, and the Senator from Michigan has no right to ask us to consider the river and harbor bill to-night. He would have adjourned at six o'clock and his bill would have gone over until to-morrow. The day before yesterday I gave notice of a night session to-night for a particular purpose and I hope every friend of the pension bill will stay here and give us a vote on it. Let us have a fair vote. If the majority of the Senate is in favor of the river and harbor bill to-night I shall say amen. If they are in favor of the pension bill, it will not take us five minutes to pass it.

Mr. PRATT. The bill now moved, as I had occasion to say to-night, has been pending in the Senate since the middle of March last. The Senate will bear me witness that I have attempted time and again to bring this bill before the Senate for its consideration. I made an appeal yesterday and stated the grounds. When to-day the Senator from Kentucky moved that we take a recess from six o'clock until half past seven, my understanding was that that motion having followed a speech upon the importance of disposing of this bill, it was the understanding of the Senate that this night should be devoted to its consideration. I came up here for that purpose, and I do not think that the consideration of the bill will occupy any great length of time. There are but three propositions in it. It is a bill amendatory of the act of February 14, 1871, which gave pensions to a certain class of the soldiers of the war of 1812 against Great Britain. That law limited the pensioners to those who had served sixty days. This bill which the House sends us admits all soldiers of the war of 1812.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would suggest to the Senator that a discussion of the merits of the bill is not in order on the motion to take it up.

Mr. PRATT. I was not stating the merits of the bill but simply what the bill contained. However, if I am out of order, I will not pursue that line of argument any longer. All I wish to say is that I think it is due to the persons who are beneficiaries of this bill that they should have a hearing at the present session. I think that this bill has been set aside long enough. If it is crowded now into the last hours of the session whose fault is it? Certainly it is not mine. As the chairman of the Committee on Pensions I reported this bill more than a month ago, and took occasion then to explain its merits in a speech of half or three-quarters of an hour. Since that time I have repeatedly made an appeal to the Senate to take it up for consideration. I hope therefore that we shall have a vote, and a vote that will indicate who are the friends of this bill.

Mr. SCOTT. I am not willing that the last remark of the Senator from Indiana shall pass without a word of reply. He says he hopes that this vote will indicate who are the friends of this bill, who are willing to have it considered. Now, Mr. President, I suppose that no Senator here is unwilling that the merits of the bill shall be considered, and I rise to express my regret that the chairman of the Committee on Finance is not in his place, because I think that there is another very serious question in this bill, or in this motion, and it is this: We now have before us the appropriation bill for the purpose of keeping in repair the harbors of the country, and of removing obstructions from the navigable rivers of the country; in other words, will we lay aside at this period of the session a bill which is necessary to be passed in order that our harbors may be kept open so that we may receive revenues enough to pay the pensions we are already liable to pay, and receive revenues enough to carry on the other operations of the Government? Will we lay aside this bill, and have our harbors filled up for want of appropriations so that our commerce cannot be carried on? That is just as important a question to be considered on this motion as who are the friends of this bill when we get it before us, and I hope that some attention will be paid to those appropriations which are necessary to enable the Government to go on and pay the pensions that others are now looking for, as well as those who are interested in this bill.

I trust, sir, that we shall stand by the chairman of the Committee on Commerce at present, and enable him to get through the river and harbor bill so that these great public works necessary to keep the Government in operation shall not fail for want of appropriations.

Mr. FLANAGAN. I for one am going to stand by the chairman of the Committee on Pensions on this occasion, and he is found in his seat. Our distinguished friend, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, is generally there; but he is absent to-night, when it is very well known to the Senate that there is no Senator here but what understood from a vote that we had upon this subject that this question was to be taken up at half past seven this evening.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Let me remind the Senator from Texas that my colleague, the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, who is so modest, whose bill is now being criticised by the Senator who is on his feet, is in his seat and pressing the consideration of the river and harbor bill.

Mr. FLANAGAN. I am very well aware of that; and complimentary to him it is to say that he is always there, particularly when rivers and harbors are spoken of. There is no doubt about that. Every Senator is well aware of that fact. I will stand by him in due time. There is no danger, as expressed by my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania, on the subject of the appropriation bills. They will be passed beyond a doubt. It is very questionable, however, from the indications that I see here, whether they will not cover up and smother out a proposition to do justice to a class of men that it is very hard to vote against. There is not a Senator here who is not immediately representing the class that it is now proposed to benefit, and they are worthy. As to the millions of money that are spoken of that it will require to do them justice, I care not what the amount may be; the millions will be well appropriated, better than they will be in many instances in the river and harbor bill, or in any other great measure that you can speak of.

It is hard to "kick against the pricks;" it is hard to vote against the old soldiers. They have been the life of this country from its earliest to its latest period of history, and we must do them justice, and I have no hesitation in saying justice will be done them; and this is the proper time, now is the time to take up and act upon this bill, and I am confident it will be done.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I suppose it is not unknown to all the Senate that the appropriations for the coming year are very likely to exceed the amount of our revenue. The bill proposed by the Senator from Indiana is likely to add to the burdens of the Treasury, as I have understood, some $15,000,000.

Mr. WEST. How is that?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I think it is very much better that we should take up some measure that will add something to the resources of the Treasury rather than diminish them. I make an appeal in behalf of what is known as the little tariff bill, and if I can get votes enough for it we will take that up and consider it to-night or immediately after the river and harbor bill is disposed of.

When we came here to-night I did not suppose that the Senate were committed to any measure. I thought that the Calendar was as much open as any other measure. I knew that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STEVENSON] was anxious to have his pet measure considered. I also knew that the chairman of the Committee on Commerce was determined to push his measure through; and there were various other favorite measures that were likely to be called up, and it would be left to the discretion of the Senate as to what they would actually do when they were assembled.

Now, Mr. President, it does seem to me that it is the height of wisdom and statesmanship that we should seek to contribute something to the Treasury rather than to deplete it. I shall therefore move at the first moment that I can that we take up the little tariff bill and consider it to-night, for if it is not disposed of to-night I fear we shall not have any other opportunity to consider it.

Mr. BOREMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana seems to intimate that he will regard this vote as a test of the friends of the pension bill. I do not think it ought to be so regarded. Certainly in the case of some Senators here it must not be so regarded. This evening we had under consideration the river and harbor bill. I think it is better to get through with one thing at a time and proceed with that bill until we finish it and then take up this bill, if it is not to be considered, as I hope it will be, during this session. I hold, then, that the vote on this motion is not to be a test.

Mr. STEVENSON. I hope it will be a test, and it is a test. No gentleman can escape the test. Gentlemen can vote as they please of course; but it is a test. This bill is not in antagonism with the river and harbor bill. The river and harbor bill gave way to a financial discussion to-day. When I asked for a session to-night it was with the distinct avowal and understanding that the soldiers' bill should have to-night.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There was no such understanding, let me tell the Senator.

Mr. STEVENSON. I beg pardon of the Senator from Vermont; he was not here; he did not hear what I said. I did say that the only object in taking the recess was to have this bill considered, and then the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, that being so, did not propose, nor did any other Senator that I heard of propose to antagonize with this bill. I could not make the motion in a form which would certainly bring up the bill as of course.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not object to the Senator from Kentucky stating what his understanding was, but I was here and heard all that the Senator said, and I have no doubt that his understanding was that he would push this bill through at all times if possible. Nobody misunderstood that. But when we were taking the vote several Senators around me said "we want a session for to-night in order that we may finish these appropriation bills, and therefore we vote for the recess." The Senator therefore has no right to say that there was any understanding that this bill should be considered to-night. We get an understanding by having the Chair put to everybody the inquiry whether there is common consent that a particular bill shall be regarded as in order. The Senator from Kentucky perfectly well understands that. I hope that we shall not be pressed with the consideration that there was an understanding that this bill was to overslaugh the appropriation bills, when the understanding has been on this side of the House for a good while, which I supposed bound us all, that appropriation bills, in the condition of the public business, when they were reached should have precedence over everything; and I say that for the benefit of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. STEVENSON. One word in reply to the Senator from Vermont. He says he heard what I said. Then he heard in Vermont what I said, because what I referred to as having been said by me was what I said on the day before yesterday.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I beg the Senator's pardon. I was referring to what he said to-day on the same subject.

Mr. STEVENSON. So I presumed. The day before yesterday I rose in my place and said that by the consent of the Senate I would this morning move to appropriate this evening to the consideration of this specific bill. There was no objection, that I heard, from any quarter. I rose this morning and made the motion. I do not mean to say that Senators are committed to it—my friend from Vermont misunderstands me there—I only mean to say that I sought to antagonize with nobody, and that the understanding of the friends of this measure was that it would be considered to-night. I do not believe that we should have had a night session if it had not been for the notice I gave and for the motion I made. That is my distinct understanding, and while I claim that no man is bound and that every man is free in good faith to vote as he pleases, I still must maintain my proposition that but for this motion of mine we should not have been here to-night. No chairman of any appropriation committee said to me "you can move that; but I shall, if necessary, move to take up my bill."

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I appreciate the position of the Senator from Kentucky and his desire to have this bill passsed. I am anxious for it also; I am in favor of having the bill acted upon at the earliest moment even if there is but little money in the public Treasury; but I must say that I thought all these measures which are sought to be brought before the Senate were to give way on account of the public necessity to the regular appropriation bills. It is with that view that I feel obliged to stand by the chairman of the Committee on Commerce and vote against taking up the bill proposed by the Senator from Indiana, although I earnestly desire that the bill should be considered.

Mr. PRATT. I wish to make a single remark in reply to what has fallen from the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] I did not intend in making this motion to antagonize the appropriation bill which was under consideration to-day. I made it upon what I considered was the understanding of the Senate, after the adoption of the resolution on motion of the Senator from Kentucky, that when the Senate took a recess at six o'clock it would meet again at seven and a half o'clock. There was nothing expressly said in that motion or resolution that the Senate would take up for consideration this pension bill this evening; but I think it was generally understood that the appropriation bill would go over until to-morrow, and that this evening would be devoted exclusively to the consideration of this pension bill. It was with that understanding that I made the motion that I did a short time since, and now I wish to have a vote upon that motion. If it is voted down, well and good; I have done my duty. I consider it my duty as the chairman of the Committee on Pensions to omit no opportunity of bringing this bill fairly before the Senate for its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana to lay aside the pending order, which is the river and harbor bill, and all prior orders, and proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 2190.

Mr. CHANDLER and Mr. STEVENSON called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. CHANDLER. It must be known to every Senator that displacing the river and harbor bill at this time is virtually abandoning it; it loses its place.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 29, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Bogy, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Flanagan, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Johnston, Kelly, Lewis, Merrimon, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ransom, Robertson, Saulsbury, Sprague, Stevenson, Stockton, Thurman, and Tipton—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Boutwell, Buckingham, Chandler, Clayton, Conover, Edmunds, Fenton, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Jones, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Ramsey, Sargent, Scott, Spencer, Wadleigh, Washburn, West, Windom, and Wright—27.

ABSENT—Messrs. Boreman, Brownlow, Cameron, Carpenter, Conkling, Cragin, Dorsey, Ferry of Connecticut, Gilbert, Hager, Harvey, Logan, McCreery, Morton, Schurz, Sherman, and Stewart—17.

So the motion of Mr. PRATT was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will report the bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. I now move that the further consideration of the river and harbor bill be postponed until the first Monday in December.

Mr. FLANAGAN and Mr. STEVENSON. I second that motion.

Mr. ANTHONY. That motion is unnecessary. The bill is postponed of course after the vote just taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That bill having been laid aside, the motion is not in order. The Clerk will report the pending bill.

THE CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask consent to make a report. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the resolution directing the Public Printer to keep an account of all expenditures for printing, mailing, and binding the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, have instructed me to report it back without amendment and recommend its passage. I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 112) directing the Public Printer to keep an account of all expenditures for printing, mailing, and binding the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, &c., was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PENSIONS TO SOLDIERS OF 1812.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 2190) to amend the act entitled "An act granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812, and the widows of deceased soldiers," approved February 14, 1871, and to restore to the pension-rolls those persons whose names were stricken therefrom in consequence of disloyalty.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Some of my brother Senators think that I rather exaggerated the amount that is involved in this bill. I therefore desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Pensions whether this bill will not involve the payment of about eleven millions of back pensions and four or five millions annually thereafter as it now stands?

Mr. PRATT. I am not able to answer with anything like precision the question of the Senator from Vermont. I will state that I am instructed by the committee to offer certain amendments to this bill, which will greatly reduce the amount necessary to be appropriated in order to pay these soldiers.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Then I will ask the chairman of the committee if he thinks the estimate I have given is an exaggerated statement or not?

Mr. PRATT. The bill as it came from the House placed upon the pension-roll all the surviving soldiers of the war of 1812, which would include of course every man who had served a day, and it placed them upon the same footing with those soldiers who served sixty days in the war and who were pensioned under the act of February 14, 1871; but I am instructed by the committee to propose an amendment to the first section of this bill, so that it will limit the pensions that are granted to those who are not already pensioned to the date of the passage of this bill; that is to say, the amendment that I shall propose will give to the surviving soldiers who were not benefited by the law of 1871 pensions from the date of the passage of this bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I hope the Senator will pardon my persistence in the pursuit of knowledge under great difficulties. He seems disinclined to give me any opinion as to the amount. I will therefore ask him whether he has not a statement of the Department itself on this subject, and if he has, I should be glad to know the estimate of the Department as to the amount involved in this bill?

Mr. PRATT. I will cheerfully answer the Senator from Vermont. I applied to the Commissioner of Pensions for an approximate estimate of how much would be required to answer the demands of this bill as it came to the Senate from the House of Representatives; and without having the figures before me, I will state in general terms that he estimated——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Have you not the letter? If you have, you had better have it read, so that we can all hear it.

Mr. PRATT. It has been once read to the Senate. I have it here somewhere among my papers.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I never heard it. Was this bill ever up before?

Mr. PRATT. It was up one day for the purpose of allowing me to explain it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the letter read. I do not remember to have heard it.

Mr. PRATT. The letter is incorporated in the remarks which I submitted to the Senate on this bill on the 6th of May, and I send a copy of it as printed in the RECORD of the 7th of May, to the Secretary's desk for the purpose of having it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) If there be no objection, the letter will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, PENSION OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., April 29, 1874.

SIR: In reply to your inquiries of this date I have the honor to answer as follows:

First. At what percentage per annum do the survivors of the war of 1812 on the roll die?

It appears from our records that during the year ending June 30, 1872, of 17,100 survivors on the roll, 604 deaths were reported, or 3.5 per cent. During the year ending 1873, of 18,266 on the roll, 2,036 deaths were reported, or 11.1 per cent.

Of the widows, out of 3,027 pensioned to June 30, 1872, 122 deaths were reported, or 4 per cent. In 1873, of 5,053 on the roll, 222 deaths, or 4.4 per cent. were reported.

It is necessary to add that this statement does not include all those of either class who died during those periods. Deaths are only reported to the office when allowances are claimed. We estimate the actual loss to the roll at about 10 per cent. per annum, though the names may remain upon the record until three years from the date of last payment, when they will be dropped by operation of law.

Second. How does the percentage of deaths increase as they get older?

From the foregoing it will appear that we are unable to give reliable information upon this point.

Third. If all the soldiers of that war (1812) should be pensioned, what would be the probable addition to the list?

Basing the estimate upon experience under the act of February 14, 1871, I find that 51,555 soldiers of the war of 1812 would have been entitled at the date of its passage for one day's service. Deducting therefrom 25 per cent. for those since deceased, 12,889, and 16⅔ per cent. as an allowance for those who, from various causes, will fail to apply, and those who will be unable to prove their claims, 6,445, and I conclude that 32,221 soldiers would be added to the list, an excess of 10,836 over the present roll.

Fourth. If widows who married before 1825 were admitted, how many would be added to the list?

Under date of January 15, 1873, I had the honor to inform you that in the opinion of this office 16,000 widows would become entitled by the extension of the limitation as to marriage down to 1825, the term of service remaining at sixty days. Proper deductions from those figures would be 10 per cent. for deaths, 1,600, and 20 per cent. for incomplete claims, 2,880, leaving 11,520 as the number who would probably become pensioners.

Fifth. If widows married before 1850 were admitted to the pension-list, to what extent would it increase the present roll?

Without claiming a great degree of accuracy for this statement, I place the number at 28,000, assuming that one day's service is intended. At date of 1825 these soldiers had reached an age when most men have formed their domestic relations, and marriages subsequent to that time were principally remarriages.

Sixth. Taking the House bill (2190) as it is, what would probably be the amount of appropriation necessary to meet the increase?

Survivors to be added, 10,386, at $96 per year	$1,040,256
Widows to be added, 28,000, at $96 per year	2,688,000
Removal of disloyalty bar, 464, at $96 per year	44,640
Total	3,772,896
To pay arrearages, three years	11,318,688
Grand total	15,091,584

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is a grand total, certainly!

The Chief Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the letter, as follows:

Upon the assumption that the claims will be adjusted immediately upon the passage of the act, this amount of appropriation would become necessary. But in fact their settlement would occupy several years, and the arrearages, to a large amount, become payable from future annual appropriations. As $400 would be required to meet the payment of each new claim admitted during the first fiscal year, if twenty thousand claims are adjusted during that period—and with a proper amount of force this can be done—an immediate appropriation of about $8,000,000 will be required.

Seventh. How many pensioners of the war of 1812 are now admitted?

Survivors	21,385

Eighth. What, since you made you last report, is the probable number of deaths of survivors and widows?

Applying this question to pensioners, I am unable, without occupying more time than you have allowed me, to give an answer. If made, as I state, under your first questions, the number reported to the office would vary materially from the correct number.

In view of your request for an immediate answer, the statement has been very hastily prepared, but is believed to be approximately correct.

Very respectfully,

JOS. LOCKEY,
Acting Commissioner.

Hon. D. D. PRATT,
Chairman Committee on Pensions, United States Senate.

Mr. PRATT. Mr. President, that estimate of the Commissioner was made upon the basis of this bill which gives all the surviving soldiers who are not now admitted to the rolls arrears back to the 14th day of February, 1871. One of the amendments which I am instructed by the committee to offer will cut off all those arrears which go to swell so largely the sum total in the estimate. I have other letters from the Commissioner here which I have abstracted, and I will proceed to give his estimates upon different hypotheses that were submitted to him; first stating, however, the number at present on the rolls according to his last report under the existing law, that law which admitted all the surviving soldiers of the war of 1812 who had served sixty days, and all of the widows of those soldiers who had died who were married previous to the conclusion of the treaty of peace. Of the surviving soldiers there are 18,266, and of widows 5,053, making in all upon the pension-roll under the act of 1871, 23,319 who are drawing pensions at this time to the annual amount of $2,238,292.

The Commissioner, in answer to a question that I propounded to him, stated that the number of survivors who served one day is estimated to be 19,246. The pensions of this number at $96 each would amount to $1,847,616.

Another question that I propounded to the Commissioner was, How many would be admitted to the roll, supposing that the bill was so changed as to include only those soldiers who had served thirty days during the war? And the estimate of the Commissioner is that the number of soldiers and widows entitled by a change in the law admitting to pensions those who have served thirty days would be 5,429, which at ninety-six dollars a year for each would amount to $511,184 per year.

I then submitted to him the question, What number of widows would be entitled by a change in this present bill, including those who were married before the year 1825, instead of the year 1850 as this bill proposes? And his answer is that the number would be 15,200, which at ninety-six dollars a year would amount to $1,459,200 per year.

The next question that I submitted to him was what number would be admitted to the roll if the term of service was limited to fourteen days, in accordance with the bounty-land act of the 3d of March, 1855, which the Senate will remember was the limit of service. All soldiers who had served in any of the wars of this country from 1790 down to that time were by law declared to be entitled to bounty-land warrants calling for one hundred and sixty acres each; and taking that law as fixing a principle upon which we should grant pensions to the surviving soldiers of the war of 1812, I asked what number would be admitted to the rolls if the House bill were so changed as to limit its provisions to those who had served fourteen days; and his estimate was that there would be 13,108 added to the rolls, which at ninety-six dollars each per year would amount to $1,258,368.

I have not before me an estimate of the amount that would be required to satisfy the fifth section of the bill which provides for the restoration to the pension-rolls of the names of all persons now surviving who were heretofore pensioned on account of services in the war of 1812 against Great Britain, and whose names were stricken from the rolls in pursuance of the act of 1862 and the joint resolution of March 4, 1867. My general recollection is, however, that the estimate of the Commissioner is that there are about four hundred and forty-odd who have been dropped from the rolls and who would be entitled to restoration under the provisions of the fifth section of this bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Have you not the report of the Commissioner on that subject?

Mr. PRATT. I have somewhere; but I do not think I have the letter here.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There must be a great many more than four hundred and forty, I should think.

Mr. PRATT. My recollection is that it was less than four hundred and fifty. I do not think I can be mistaken about that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How much is the arrearage due to each man?

Mr. PRATT. According to the provisions of the fifth section of this bill these men who have been dropped from the rolls would be taken up just as if their pensions had never been suspended, and of course there would be twelve years of arrearages; that is supposing they were dropped from the rolls in 1862 at the time the law on that subject passed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Although in fact they did not draw after 1861, I suppose; so that you should add another year.

Mr. PRATT. That may be or it may not. Now, Mr. President, the first amendment which I am instructed by the Committee on Pensions to move is to strike out from line 3 to line 6 of section 1, in the following words:

That the act granting pensions to the surviving soldiers of the war of 1812, approved February 14, 1871, be amended, so as to read as follows.

That is stricken out for two purposes. In the first place, to meet the objection that was made upon a former occasion by the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] that legislation of this kind was vicious because of reference to laws which had been repealed in the revision of the statutes; and for another reason, that this provision would entitle those who took under this bill to draw pensions from the 14th of February, 1871, whereas the instructions of the committee to me were to report such amendments as would make the pensions to the surviving soldiers commence from the passage of this bill. Therefore the first motion which I make is to strike out the words in the first section which I have just read.

Mr. WEST. I think before the Senator passes from the subject of the number of pensioners and the amount involved, that the Senate ought to know in distinct and succinct terms what is the amount of money sought to be appropriated by this bill. There is no amount specified in the bill. Now, cannot the Senator divest it of all the verbiage of the difference of classification and tell us distinctly and straightforwardly how much money is involved in the bill?

Mr. PRATT. I can answer the Senator from Louisiana better when this bill has been considered and has been amended. He asks now how much will be taken from the Treasury if the bill should pass in its present form. Of course I cannot anticipate the action of the Senate upon the different provisions in this bill. Therefore I cannot respond to his question.

Mr. WEST. I did not ask the Senator the question as to what amount would be involved in the bill after the Senate should have concluded it; but I ask him now, as he has reported favorably on the bill and advocates it, how much is involved in the bill as it stands?

Mr. PRATT. The Senator has listened I presume, or he ought to have listened, to the estimate of the Commissioner of Pensions. He speaks of me as the advocate of this bill. I am not the advocate of the bill as it stands. I am instructed, on the contrary, by the Committee on Pensions to propose certain amendments, and I propose to submit certain amendments of my own motion. The estimate of the Commissioner of Pensions is that to meet the demands of this bill in its present form, including arrearages, will require something upward of $15,000,000.

Mr. WEST. Ah! that is the answer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY.) The Senator from Indiana offers an amendment which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out in section 1 the following words:

That the act granting pensions to the surviving soldiers of the war of 1812, approved February 14, 1871, be amended so as to read as follows.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. How will the section read when amended?

The CHIEF CLERK. The first section will then commence:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-rolls the names of the surviving officers and enlisted and drafted men, including militia and volunteers, &c.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, no member of this body is disposed to oppose a pension bill; every Senator feels grateful to any one who risked his life in the defense of the country; but it does seem to me that in the closing hours of the session, and after we have been engaged here to-day for twelve hours, to introduce for consideration in the present state of the finances of the country a bill which we are told makes a draft upon the Treasury of more than $15,000,000 is an act wanting in patriotism. We owe a duty to the country, a duty to its finances, a duty to the Treasury, that should make us hesitate. It may be that in a more prosperous condition of the country, it may be that when our financial condition is improved, this measure or some well-considered measure in this direction may commend itself to Congress. But after we have been here twelve hours to-day, when we have but a day left of the session, when it is utterly impossible to consider a bill of this magnitude as it should be considered, I say that instead of being an act of patriotism, it is an act wanting in patriotism to introduce and force it upon the Senate. Sir, to gain $15,000,000 into this Treasury the whole nation has been disturbed and we have sent commissioners to Geneva and had an arbitration with England. We had insisted upon it and were ready to go to war to obtain it. But now when everybody in the Senate is worn out, when there is no opportunity of considering this measure, we are forced to take up a bill appropriating $15,000,000, and I would like to ask my friend from Indiana, after this $15,000,000 is expended, what will be the annual expenditure for the next five or ten years?

Mr. PRATT. It will depend entirely on the form which this bill takes after it has been considered by the Senate. I cannot answer the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I think my friend ought to be able to answer the Senator from New Jersey. It is no satisfaction to me, when I am bound here on my oath to protect the interest of the Treasury of this country, for one who promotes a bill to tell me that after the bill has passed and becomes a law, and when the information can be of no value, then he will be prepared to tell me what will be the draft upon the Treasury! I suppose that it will cost four or five millions a year for the next ten years to fulfill the obligations of this bill.

Mr. PRATT. If the arrears feature of the bill is stricken out, I do not think it will require more than $3,000,000 a year at the very outside to satisfy the demands of this bill. I may say further that it appears from the letter of the Commissioner that the average age of the surviving soldiers of the war of 1812 is at this time about eighty-one years. Why, Mr. President, it is nearly sixty years since peace was concluded with Great Britain. Peace was made, as the Senate is aware, in December, 1814. Here we are in the year of grace 1874. It will be in December next sixty years since the men who will take the benefit of the provisions of this bill were disbanded. The Senate can judge for itself how rapidly this list will diminish. Why, sir, they are falling now rapidly like leaves in December. The last survivor will not probably live more than ten or fifteen years at the very outside.

Why should we hesitate to do this measure of justice to the survivors of that war, when we consider the liberal legislation in behalf of the revolutionary soldiers? There are Senators here who in 1864 voted to pay so long as he lived to every surviving soldier of the revolutionary war $100 in addition to the pension he was drawing though he had never been disabled in the service of the country. Why, sir, Congress from time to time has voted seventy-four millions of acres to the soldiers of the country in its different wars. Most of the survivors of the war of 1812 are poor, many of them objects of charity, eighty-one years of age. They can last but a few years at most. Why should we grude what we so freely gave to the soldiers of the Revolution, ninety-six dollars a year? It is but a pittance to each of them; and as I said before if you cut off the arrears which the House gave to these soldiers and to their widows I think the figure that I named is the very outside amount which will be required to be appropriated for the purpose of paying these survivors and their widows the first year. It will be much less the second, still less the third, diminishing rapidly, until ten years hence probably there will scarcely be a survivor left on the rolls.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I wish to ask my friend a question, and I ask for information because I do not know. What effect upon the claim of a pensioner under this bill would it have if he has been engaged in a war against the United States since 1812?

Mr. PRATT. The fifth section of this bill restores to the pension-roll all those soldiers of the war of 1812 who were disabled in the service of the country and fighting under its flag, men who are hobbling around on crutches, stretched upon beds of sickness; men who at the time this rebellion occurred were sixty-five or seventy years of age at least, and who could have given no active aid or comfort or assistance to the rebellion; men to whom the nation owed a solemn debt, each one of whom held a certificate from this Government that it would pay him ninety-six dollars a year, and there was no condition written in that certificate. The act of 1862 did not confiscate that debt. It simply suspended its payment, and for wise and politic reasons. But the pensions which are restored by the fifth section of this bill are in the nature of indemnifications that the country was paying to those men who had lost their health and strength in its service in the war of 1812. That is the class of men whom this bill restores to the pension-roll, not simply men who had served in that war, but men who had been disabled, broken down in that war and rendered incapable of earning their subsistence. Does any gentleman who listens to me refuse to resume payment now nine years since the war has concluded? I have heard a great deal of patriotic talk in this Hall against repudiation; but, Mr. President, can you conceive a more shameful act of repudiation than for the nation to refuse to pay pensions to these men who were injured in its service and fighting under the flag of the country, whose pension certificates were as I said before simply in the nature of indemnity that the nation agreed to pay them for their losses of health and strength?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Will my friend be good enough to answer my question?

Mr. PRATT. I did not understand the question.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I asked what effect this bill had—and I asked for information, for I did not know—upon the pension of those who had engaged in war against the country.

Mr. PRATT. Mr. President, the acts affected by this section were leveled against those who had given aid and comfort to the rebellion.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Which section is it?

Mr. PRATT. The fifth section. I will read it:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to restore to the pension-rolls the names of all persons now surviving heretofore pensioned on account of service in the war of 1812 against Great Britain—

And the bill might have added "pensioned because of disability incurred in service rendered to their country," because that was the fact. No one else was admitted to the pension-roll—and whose names were stricken from the rolls in pursuance of the act entitled "An act," &c.

I have before me the two acts under which payments were stopped to these soldiers. The act of February 4, 1862, reads as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to strike from the pension-rolls the names of all such persons as have or may hereafter take up arms against the Government of the United States, or—or who have in any manner encouraged the rebels or manifested a sympathy with their cause.

If a man living right in the heart of secession, in South Carolina, manifested any degree of sympathy whatever with the cause of the rebellion his name was at once stricken from the roll under the provisions of this act. Although he may have been a paralytic, though he may have been stretched on a bed of sickness, though he was going about on crutches and could render the rebellion no service at all, yet this law struck his name from the pension-rolls. The joint resolution of March 2, 1867, simply prohibited "payment by any Government officer to any person not known to have been opposed to the rebellion." I believe now I have answered the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Then I understand the question to be this: For sixty years this Government has not felt the great obligation which seems, near twelve o'clock at midnight on the last day but one of the session of Congress, to propose to take $15,000,000 out of the Treasury at a time when we cannot consider it. For these sixty years this Government has suffered that claim to rest until now comes a provision that those are to be paid who have taken up arms against the Government of the United States; for this act by its very terms repeals the act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to strike from the pension-rolls the names of such persons as have taken up arms against the United States or who have in any manner encouraged the rebels. That is the act that is repealed.

Mr. President, I do not say, I do not mean to commit myself one way or the other on that point, that a state of circumstances may not possibly exist which would authorize the repeal of that act; but I do mean to say that this is no time, at this hour, at this period of the session, to consider an act of that character. It ought to have the calm and careful deliberation of the Senate. It ought to be made known to the country. If we are going to vote away $15,000,000 or $16,000,000, or as I make it it out $20,000,000, for that letter reported that a deduction of from $4,000,000 to $5,000,000 was made for fifteen thousand who it was thought would not present claims—if we are going to make such an appropriation in the present state of our finances and relieve those who took up arms against the Government and pay a large part of it to them, we ought to do it deliberately, we ought to do it at a time when the country can be heard from. I do not think that it is a patriotic mode of manifesting our patriotism.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I may be wanting in patriotism; but I came here this evening in order that I might assist to do justice to a class of men who before a large number of the members of this Senate had a being were fighting the battles of the country and upholding its honor against a foreign foe. Patriotism is something undefined; what the Senator from New Jersey may call patriotism might not be regarded as patriotism by others; but if there is any act which a Senator on this floor can perform which is patriotic, it is that of rewarding the men who fought the battles of this country and helped to maintain its honor and dignity when that honor and dignity were threatened by a foreign enemy. I do not think the declaration is justifiable that it is wanting in patriotism in Senators to avow their readiness to do justice to the men, the youngest of whom is now at least seventy-five years of age, who in 1812 enlisted in the service of the country and who have been postponed from time to time. Now in their last days when there is an effort made to do justice to them, when a Senator on this floor rises up and denounces that as unpatriotic, I must say that I think such language is unbecoming at least in this Senate. If it is unpatriotic, then for one I glory in being unpatriotic. I am willing to reward the men who before I had an existence fought the battles of this country, and I am much more willing to reward those than I am younger men near my own age. Sir, they are now destitute, they are helpless, they are unable to provide for themselves; and in their old age, in their infirmity, when we know the value of their services to the country, I take issue with the Senator and I say it is unpatriotic not to reward them.

If we postpone placing these soldiers on the pension-list a few years longer, the last of them will have passed away. I suppose the Senator from New Jersey desires a postponement of this question; but I think that to-night is the time; I do not care whether it is near twelve o'clock or whether it is one o'clock or five o'clock in the morning. I came here to vote for this bill, and I am ready to stay here until seven o'clock in the morning in order to accomplish it. I hope the friends of this bill will not suffer themselves to be defeated in their undertaking, but that they will stand by it and that they will restore to the pension-list every man who was struck off because of his supposed sympathy with secession. I want to see these men restored back. I want to see the last marks of distinction between loyal and disloyal men wiped out. The time has come when we should have nothing of that feeling. A continual keeping up of this agitation about loyal and disloyal men is doing more harm to this country to-day than a little. I heard a speech no later than yesterday in this Senate in which the terms "rebel" and "traitor" and so forth were used. That kind of language, in my opinion, is calculated to keep up ill-feeling in the country. We should do everything to blot out the remembrance of the late war, that we may become once more a united people, united not only under a common Government, but in common sympathies, in common feelings, having but one destiny, and feeling a common pride in our own great country.

Mr. FLANAGAN. Mr. President, I feel anxious to add a few remarks in direct harmony with those that have been presented so ably by my distinguished friend from Delaware. I indorse his sentiments throughout. It is time that this great question should be buried. What are the evidences here? Recently we have mourned the death of distinguished generals who had achieved valiant actions upon many battle-fields in the recent unfortunate struggle alluded to by him. Their actions were meritorious. I never sympathized with that rebellion in the first degree at any moment of my life. Previous to it, when I saw it was upon us as the little cloud that was to be seen in the heavens, I warned my fellow-citizens against it. But all those things I am gratified to know have passed away; and now when one of the distinguished generals who served in that war dies, a pension is voted almost instantly to the widow. I vote for such bills every day. Now I am gratified to have an opportunity to vote for the widows of the soldiers of 1812 who so nobly fought for and delivered his country from the perils that were upon it. I want to place them side by side; that brings the old and new together in harmony.

Sir, it is the proper period for us to forgive those who were once stricken from the pension-rolls because they happened to live in the rebellious portions of this Union, that, unfortunately as I conceive, endeavored to dissolve the best Government that civilized man has ever been blessed with. I forgive them. Why should I not? In this I am consistent with the action of the Senate in other matters. Am I not? Now, when a southerner asks for relief from his political disabilities, no man in the Senate withholds it. If he only asks for it it is accorded to him with all manner of cheerfulness. How can you relieve him from his disabilities and then, acting consistently and in line, refuse the little pittance which he asks from the Government as a pension? You cannot do it. Then you must replace him where he originally was. How is it as to confiscated property? You are placing everybody in statu quo just as far as you are possibly able to do so; you are giving equity; you are giving justice; you are giving them perhaps more than they deserve. I think they were wrong, but I have the magnanimity I trust, on this occasion, as I have invariably had to accord to them the same honesty of purpose that I claim. I have no hesitation in saying thousands of them believed they were correct. I never did believe they were. But now that question is buried and we must do justice to them, and in doing justice to them we certainly will protect ourselves.

It is said this will cost millions. I know not what it may foot up; but properly has that been answered by the distinguished Senator who has the bill in charge. It will depend evidently upon the amendments that may be made. But I do not beg that question; I am not in the habit of doing so. Whenever I am for a measure I am for it, and when I am opposed to it I am as plainly situated. I care not what the millions may be. It is a principle I am looking to. I think this is a debt meritoriously due, and the money cannot be bette- appropriated. Nay, sir, in the river and harbor bill or any other bill that is before the Congress of the United States there can be no appropriation that has more merit in it in my humble opinion than this. I confess I am anxious to get an opportunity to record my vote in behalf of the old soldier and in behalf of his widow. My distinguished friend from New Jersey says that the time may come for this. We heard that expressed many, many years ago. We read of a "convenient season;" but we are admonished that it never came; nor will it come for this matter if the bill is now postponed. There are those who are dying off to-night, as I am speaking here in all probability, who should have been protected at an earlier day; and I do not wish to postpone; I want to relieve them at the earliest period.

It is objected further that this is an inopportune time, that this bill cannot be properly investigated now. Well, it is very evident that every Senator here knows the importunity, the mighty struggle that my friend, the chairman of the Committee on Pensions, made the other day. He made a gigantic charge upon the Senate, admonishing them of the injustice they were doing, and that he would keep this bill before them and upon them from time to time, and if it has not been considered by the Senators it seems to me that they might say that which I surely would not say of them, that they had been a little remiss.

This is a great question they say now. If so, it ought to have had their attention. It has had mine; it has had my sympathies; I am all anxiety to record my vote in behalf of it, and I do second the motion of the Senator from Delaware, and hope that the Senators in favor of the passage of this bill will not be governed by the hands that we see moving on yonder clock steadily, but that they will sit here till the bill is passed. I am one of the oldest, perhaps the oldest here, but on this occasion I feel buoyant like a boy. I will sit here as long as any Senator will remain in this great and just cause.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, I do not rise to participate in the discussion of the patriotic sentiments connected with this bill; but I think when the Senate of the United States proposes to be liberal to whoever may deserve their liberality, they ought to understand whether they have the means under their control belonging to the people in the hands of the Government of the United States to exercise that liberality with. I regret that the chairman of the Committee on Finance is not here to give something like a comprehensive statement of the financial condition of this country at the present moment. I have made since this debate opened and since I was startled by the magnitude of the figures presented by the Senator from Indiana a rough estimate of the financial situation of this country for the coming year, and I wish to call the attention of Senators now to the fact that my conclusions, however imperfect they may be, point directly to the fact that whatever amount you appropriate in this bill you are going to be short in your finances; whatever amount you appropriate in this bill you must issue bonds of the United States to meet; and I ask the other side of the House, who are mostly in favor of this bill, whether they propose to indulge in liberality at the expense of a further increase of the public debt? Now let us see these figures.

The Secretary of the Treasury in his estimate laid before us at the opening of this session of Congress points us to the fact that the total estimated revenues of this country for the coming fiscal year will be $305,700,000, and the estimated expenditures of the Government for the same period are $319,191,000. There is a deficiency of nearly $14,000,000 in the fiscal budget of this country for the coming year, not comprehending the countless and innumerable appropriations that have been made here by special bills.

The Committee on Appropriations have sat here, and in scrutinizing the bills that have been submitted to them they have been actuated by a desire to reduce the appropriations to the lowest possible limit, and by commendable economy we probably can offer a budget to the country that will bring us about even. That is as near as I can understand the figures, although many of the bills have not been completed at the present time.

Mr. THURMAN. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the committee, who has this bill in charge, whether he wishes us to sit it out or not? We have been in session now for twelve and a half hours with the exception of a brief recess. Whether or not we shall make any greater progress by sitting this bill out to-night, being completely exhausted to-morrow and unable to do any serious work, is a very questionable thing with me.

I make this inquiry certainly in no spirit of hostility to the bill, because I am inclined to favor it; but if we are not to sit it out we had better adjourn, I think, at once. If we are to sit it out, we had better know what we are to do, so that we may govern ourselves accordingly. We ought to know whether we are to sit it out or not, and I would be glad therefore to know what the Senator wishes, whether he wishes us to sit it out or not.

Mr. PRATT. I will state there are important amendments to be offered.

Mr. THURMAN. If we adjourn now this bill will be the unfinished business, will it not, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WRIGHT in the chair.) It will.

Mr. PRATT. I shall interpose no objection to the adjournment proposed.

Mr. THURMAN. I will not make the motion against the wishes of the chairman. If the chairman wishes to sit the bill out I will sit it out with him, but if he has no objection I suggest that we had better adjourn.

Mr. PRATT. I have no objection.

Mr. THURMAN. Then I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. LEWIS. I hope the Senate will not adjourn. We shall never get another chance to vote for this bill if we adjourn now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. COOPER and Mr. DAVIS called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

The yeas and nays were taken.

Mr. SPENCER. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.] If he were here he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] He would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

Mr. RANSOM. I desire to state that on this bill the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CARPENTER] and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] are paired. Mr. BAYARD would vote for the bill, and Mr. CARPENTER against it.

Mr. SPENCER. I desire to make a statement in reference to myself and the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.] If he were here he would vote against the bill, and I would vote for it.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope the vote will be announced, and we can have these explanations to-morrow morning.

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Boreman, Boutwell, Chandler, Clayton, Conover, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Hager, Hamlin, Hitchcock, Jones, McCreery, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Oglesby, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Sargent, Scott, Thurman, Washburn, West, Windom, and Wright—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bogy, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Fenton, Flanagan, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton of Texas, Johnston, Kelly, Lewis, Merrimon, Norwood, Patterson, Ransom, Robertson, Saulsbury, Stevenson, and Tipton—21.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bayard, Brownlow, Buckingham, Cameron, Carpenter, Conkling, Cragin, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Connecticut, Gilbert, Hamilton of Maryland, Harvey, Howe, Ingalls, Logan, Mitchell, Morton, Schurz, Sherman, Spencer Sprague, Stewart, Stockton, and Wadleigh—25.

So the motion was agreed to; and (at eleven o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, June 19, 1874.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the further reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORT ON TRANSPORTATION.

Mr. DONNAN, from the Committee on Printing, submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed six thousand copies of the report, with appendix and evidence, of the Select Committee of the Senate on Transportation to the Sea-board, four thousand of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, and two thousand for the use of the Senate.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER OF EDUCATION.

Mr. DONNAN also, from the same committee, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there shall be printed twenty thousand copies of the report of the Commissioner of Education, five thousand of which number shall be for the use of the Commissioner, five thousand for the use of the Senate, and ten thousand for the use of the House of Representatives.

REPORT ON FISH AND FISHERIES.

Mr. DONNAN also, from the same committee, reported the following concurrent resolution of the Senate; which was read, considered, and concurred in:

Resolved, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That Spencer F. Baird, United States Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries, be authorized to have the engravings for his report executed under the direction of the Joint Committee on Public Printing.

STATISTICAL ATLAS.

Mr. DONNAN also, from the same committee, reported the following resolution:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That the three thousand copies of the Statistical Atlas of the United States, based on the results of the ninth census, now being compiled by Francis A. Walker, the publication of which is provided for by the act of March 3, 1873, shall be distributed for public and official use as follows: Twenty-five copies for the President; six hundred copies for the Senate; one thousand two hundred copies for the House of Representatives; two hundred and twenty-five copies for the State Department, and for transmission to United States legations and the more important consulates abroad, and to the legations of foreign governments in Washington; seventy-five copies for the Treasury Department; forty copies for the War Department; twenty-five copies for the Navy Department; twenty-five copies for the Department of Justice; twenty-five copies for the Department of Agriculture; six hundred copies for the Department of the Interior for its use and distribution among the executives of the several States, State libraries, and libraries and literary institutions; sixty copies for the Library of Congress, and one hundred copies for Francis A. Walker.

Mr. DONNAN. I will state to the House that the printing of this document was ordered by the last Congress but no provision was made for its distribution.

The resolution was agreed to.

REPORT ON MINING STATISTICS.

Mr. DONNAN, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following concurrent resolution:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That of the report of R. W. Raymond on mining statistics, with the accompanying engravings, there be printed three thousand copies for the House of Representatives, two thousand for the Senate, one thousand copies for the Treasury Department, and one thousand copies for the commissioner.

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems to me that we are running into a very unusual expense to the Treasury for these plates. I think I have not known for many years the publication of so many plates as are now recommended by the Committee on Printing. It will be attended with a great deal of expense.

Mr. DONNAN. This was recommended by the committee two or three months ago, and was in the hands of one of my colleagues on the committee to be reported. He is absent and I have reported it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Unless we are to adopt some mode of distributing these documents to the country which will be more certain than by this mode, I do not think we should adopt this resolution.

Mr. DONNAN. It is the usual publication, and two thousand less copies.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think we are going into a great expense.

The resolution was adopted.

PRINTING OF DEBATES.

Mr. DONNAN, from the Committee on Printing, reported a joint resolution (H. R. No. 112) in regard to printing the debates of Congress.

The resolution upon which the committee acted was as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be, and they are hereby, directed to inquire into the cost of reporting and printing the debates of Congress, as the work is now being done; whether it was not more acceptably and economically done by the proprietors of the Globe; whether the permanent establishment of the work at the Government Printing Office will not involve large expenditures for facilities for its prosecution, and to report by bill or otherwise at as early a day as practicable.

The joint resolution accompanying the report was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Congressional Printer be, and he is hereby, directed to keep a separate and exact account in detail of all expenditures for printing, mailing, and binding the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, including specific statements of the cost of all machinery and material which may have been or shall be used for the publication of said RECORD, commencing with its first publication at the Government Printing Office, and that he shall publish the amounts thus yearly expended in his next succeeding annual report, and each succeeding report, separately from the other disbursements of his office.

Mr. DONNAN. I desire briefly to call the attention of the House to the conclusions of the committee. In regard to the reporting of the debates, the system of which has been changed, and which until the very recent action of the two Houses materially reduced the expense, it has by the action of the two Houses within the last ten days been so arranged as to make the cost of reporting precisely what it was for the last Congress. In regard to the expense of printing and binding the debates the committee come to the conclusion that the printing of the debates of the present Congress at the Government Printing Office will cost the Government (if the volume of work shall equal that of the last Congress) at least $125,000 less than was paid to Messrs. Rives & Bailey for the same volume of work for the Forty-second Congress.

The present quarto form of the daily RECORD, although attended with slightly increased cost, is greatly preferable to the newspaper form.

Upon a calculation of comparative cost, upon an equal quality of paper, as between the Government Printing-Office and the Globe office, the proposal for the work of Messrs. Rives & Bailey is to be increased in the sum of $24,727.55 for 10,914 pages of printed matter and 12,332 copies.

The proposal of Rives & Bailey, so far as it relates to the binding, if they furnish equal quality of material with that now used, is $6,116 cheaper (the volume of the work being as stated above) for the debates of a full Congress than the binding is now being done at the Government Office.

The cost of the debates of the present Congress, the number being now fixed at 10,350 copies, if the work makes 10,014 pages, will cost $213,508.49, which is less than it would cost under the proposed contract of Rives & Bailey, making proportionate allowances on the cost of paper and the loss at the Government Office on binding, and counting the entire stereotyping a real loss to the Government, in the sum of $61,182.06.

The probable expenditure for facilities to continue this work at the Government Printing Office will be comparatively trifling.

It would be the reverse of economy to enter into the proposed contract with Rives & Bailey.

The expenditure for this work ought to be kept separate and distinct from other Government printing, and so definitely and minutely reported that Congress may be able to readily know what this work is costing; and the committee therefore recommend the passage of the joint resolution which has just been read.

I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DONNAN. I move to reconsider the various votes upon the reports from the Committee on Printing; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to make a suggestion in regard to the business of the House. The Committee on War Claims desire to make sundry reports, adverse and favorable, upon matters which have been referred to them, for the purpose of having the same referred to the Committee of the Whole and placed on the Private Calendar. If that shall be done to-day it will be almost impossible for the clerk to journalize them. The former custom was for committees on the last day of the session to make their reports to the House, to be journalized as of the last day of the session and correctly entered on the Private Calendar for the next session. The Chair suggests that it would be well to adopt that plan now. If the mass of papers in possession of the committees shall be reported to-day, it will be impossible to correctly journalize them as of to-day. But the proceedings of the last day of the session are journalized with great care and the Private Calendar made up with corresponding care. It will lead to much more certain correctness of the Journal if that plan should be followed with regard to committees making reports this session.

Mr. SENER. There is no intention to pass upon these claims at this period of the session.

Mr. LAWRENCE. We do not propose to pass upon them.

Mr. SENER. Of course; all you want is to advertise the conclusions of the committees.

The SPEAKER. It will be impossible to journalize them properly if made now.

Mr. LAWRENCE. There are not so many reports but what the clerks can make up the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The Calendar would not be printed.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Then I will ask unanimous consent now that on the last day of the session I may be permitted to make these reports.

The SPEAKER. Of course it is the right of a committee, not of individuals, to report for reference to the Private Calendar. If there be no objection, on the last day of the session any committee of the House having had a subject before them will be permitted to report upon that subject, favorably or adversely, for reference to the Private Calendar, their reports to be filed at the Clerk's desk for that purpose.

Mr. HARRISON. I object.

Mr. MONROE. I move that the rules be suspended in order that such leave may be given to the committees of the House.

The motion to suspend the rules was seconded; upon a division, ayes 105, noes not counted; and (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the order made.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. FIELD. Mr. Speaker, yesterday, in moving to suspend the rules for the purpose of putting on its passage the bill (H. R. No. 3521) to incorporate the National Iron-molders' Union, I stated that the bill was reported from the Committee on Education and Labor with the recommendation that it do pass, whereupon the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STORM] arose and denied that I was authorized to report the bill from that committee. Without commenting upon the remarks of the gentleman and the lack of courtesy exhibited by him on that occasion, I send to the desk an extract from the records of the committee furnished to me by its clerk, which will show on what authority I acted yesterday in asking the House to suspend the rules and pass that bill as a report from the Committee on Education and Labor.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Extract from minutes of Committee on Education and Labor.]

H. R. No. 3521, to incorporate the National Iron-molders' Union.

1874, June 3.—Mr. FIELD called up the bill and moved that the committee report it favorably to the House. Mr. MCDILL seconded the motion. The motion was declared carried. Mr. STORM voted nay, and said that he reserved his right to oppose the bill in the House.

E. B. WIGHT, Clerk.

Mr. STORM. I desire to say that I am informed this morning by an honorable gentleman of the committee that though the entry just read was made, the clerk, Mr. Wight, who made the entry has said that the bill was merely directed to be reported in order to get rid of the importunity of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FIELD] who was very desirous of passing the bill. That is what I understand the clerk says this morning.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has again to remark that he has never before known disputes to arise so frequently as at this session in regard to what has been done in committees. Such disputes are very unseemly things to occur in the House. They involve questions of veracity between gentlemen, the most delicate of all questions ever brought before the House. In this case the Chair begs to state that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FIELD] is sustained by the records of the committee.

Mr. MAYNARD. As a member of the Committee on Rules, I wish to ask whether it is not contrary to the rules and out of order to make any reference on the floor to what transpires in a committee?

The SPEAKER. It is; but any member of a committee has a right to make the point upon another member that he is not authorized to present a report; because if a member makes a report he is not authorized to make he is committing a very censurable act; and the Chair thinks that any gentleman who questions lightly the authority of another to make a report commits an act not wholly within parliamentary propriety.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. As to the point raised by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD,] the report of a committee is itself a statement that the committee have authorized that report to be made, and to that extent it is a statement of what has transpired in the committee.

The SPEAKER. That is a matter of necessity.

Mr. MAYNARD. I had reference to the discussion, &c., occurring in a committee room.

The SPEAKER. It is not within parliamentary propriety to refer to such things in the House.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, House bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 3417) to relieve Thomas Claiborne, of Tennessee, or political disabilities imposed upon him by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States;

A bill (H. R. No. 3332) to fix the time for the election of Representatives in the Forty-fourth Congress from the State of Mississippi;

A bill (H. R. No. 3680) for the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 3740) to create the Bozeman land district in the Territory of Montana;

A bill (H. R. No. 3748) directing the Secretary of the Treasury to report upon the necessity for a public building at Brooklyn, New York, and the cost of the same; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2701) to relieve William G. Jones, of Alabama, of political disabilities.

The message also announced that the Senate had concurred in the amendments of the House to bills of the following titles:

A bill (S. No. 176) to encourage the establishment of public marine schools; and

A bill (S. No. 311) for the relief of Joseph Montanari, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed House joint resolution and bill of the following titles, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 95) authorizing the Postmaster-General to perfect title to certain real estate obtained from John W. Norton, a defaulter to the postal money-order bureau; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2797) making appropriations for the payment of claims reported allowed by the commissioners of claims under the act of Congress of March 3, 1871.

SALE OF ARSENAL GROUNDS AT SAINT LOUIS, MISSOURI.

Mr. WELLS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3759) amendatory of the act providing for the sale of the arsenal grounds at Saint Louis, Missouri, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1869; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PATENT LAWS.

Mr. E. R. HOAR, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3760) amendatory of the patent laws; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT AUBURN, NEW YORK.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I move to suspend the rules and pass a bill (H. R. No. 3761) directing the Secretary of the Treasury to report upon the necessity of a public building at the city of Auburn, New York.

The bill, which was read, directs the Secretary of the Treasury to report to Congress at the beginning of the next session whether the present needs of the Government require the erection of a public building at Auburn, New York, and the estimated cost of the same, including the site.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust we will not enter upon the work of constructing any more public buildings.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. This simply authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to make an estimate.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is the first step toward the construction of the building.

The question recurred on the motion to suspend the rules.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 27, noes 25.

Mr. NEGLEY demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. NEGLEY and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 81, noes 40.

So the motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

Mr. KILLINGER. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules, as it seems that we are going to have a great many like propositions.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let us first try a division.

Mr. KILLINGER. Very well.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 35, noes 67.

Mr. MACDOUGALL demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. MACDOUGALL and Mr. KILLINGER were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 103, nays 30.

Mr. KILLINGER demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 151, nays 67, not voting 71; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Averill, Banning, Barnum, Barry, Bass, Bell, Blount, Bowen, Bradley, Bright, Bromberg, Buffinton, Burleigh, Cain, Caldwell, Amos Clark, jr., John B. Clark, jr., Clymer, Coburn, Comingo, Conger, Cook, Creamer, Crittenden, Crocker, Crooke, Crossland, Crounse, Crutchfield, Danford, Darrall, Davis, Dobbins, Donnan, Dunnell, Durham, Eames, Eldredge, Glover, Gooch, Hagans, Benjamin W. So (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING, ATLANTA, GEORGIA.

Mr. WHITELEY. I move to suspend the rules so that my colleague from the third district of Georgia [Mr. COOK] may introduce and the House may pass a bill (H. R. No. 3762) to amend the act entitled "An act for the erection of a public building for the use of the United States in Atlanta, Georgia.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the House will take a recess for thirty minutes.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I move to go to the business on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. There is a motion pending for that purpose.

Mr. MAYNARD. Why does the gentleman from Ohio move to take a recess for thirty minutes?

Mr. GARFIELD. To prevent if I can the passage of bills for the construction of any more public buildings.

Mr. POLAND. My object yesterday in offering the proposition I did was to try to get something satisfactory to all parties. I had the usual fate, and without satisfying anybody have subjected myself to misconstruction. I now withdraw my proposition.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope we will be allowed to call up the amendments of the Senate to the post-office appropriation bill.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I move to suspend the rules and go to the business upon the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia has the floor on a motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. WHITELEY. I move to suspend the rules so that my colleague may introduce and the House may pass a bill to amend the act entitled "An act for the erection of a public building for the use of the United States in Atlanta, Georgia."

Mr. CONGER. There are important reports to be made from committees, and I hope an opportunity will be afforded to do so at this time.

Mr. WHITELEY. I insist on my motion to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The bill was read. It provides that the act named in the title be so amended that the sum authorized to be expended in the construction of the building be fixed at $250,000; and that no sum in excess thereof shall be expended upon said building.

Mr. KILLINGER. Is that the same bill we voted on yesterday?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move the House take a recess for an hour.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move the House adjourn, and on that demand the yeas and nays. I believe it to be my duty to prevent, as far as I can, the passage of bills for the construction of any more public buildings during this session of Congress.

The SPEAKER. The same motion which will adjourn will refuse to second the motion to suspend the rules. It is the carelessness of gentlemen in regard to seconding a motion to suspend the rules which precipitates a good deal of the trouble in getting to the public business. The rules give to the majority the right by a vote, not by yeas and nays, to refuse a second.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. This proposition is very different from the last. The last simply called upon the Secretary of the Treasury for information. This is a proposition to increase the appropriation heretofore authorized.

Mr. SPEER. I object to debate. One is in Georgia, the other is in New York.

The question being taken on seconding the motion to suspend the rules, there were—ayes 48, noes 56; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered under the rules; and Mr. COOK and Mr. SCOFIELD were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported ayes 108, noes not counted.

So the motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

The question was on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

Mr. KILLINGER. I call for the yeas and nays.

On ordering the yeas and nays there were—ayes 35, a sufficient number.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 157, nays 56, not voting 76; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albright, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Averill, Barnum, Barry, Beck, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Caldwell, Cason, John B. Thomas, Waddell, Wheeler, White, Wilber, William Williams, Jeremiah M. Wilson, and Woodford—76.

So (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. TYNER. I rise to report back from the Committee on Appropriations the bill (H. R. No. 3094) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, with the Senate amendments and the recommendations of the Committee on Appropriations thereon. But I yield for a few moments to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOOPER.]

WATCH PRESENTED BY GENERAL WASHINGTON TO MARQUIS DE LA FAYETTE.

Mr. HOOPER. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution making an appropriation for the purchase and restoration to the family of the Marquis de La Fayette of the watch presented to him by General Washington.

The joint resolution was read. It appropriates the sum of $300, or so much thereof as may be necessary, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purchase and restoration to the family of the Marquis de La Fayette of the watch presented to him by General Washington, and lost by General La Fayette during his last visit to this country, such purchase and restoration to be made under the direction of the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests to the gentleman from Massachusetts that before the resolution is voted upon it might be well to change it so as to place the matter under the charge of the Secretary of State instead of the House of Representatives. The Chair thinks that as a matter of propriety that would be better.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think that would be rather more appropriate.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to say a word or two on the resolution.

Mr. NIBLACK. If the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOOPER] has any explanation to make I think he ought to be heard.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to modifying the joint resolution by substituting "Secretary of State" for "Speaker of the House of Representatives?"

There was no objection, and the joint resolution was modified accordingly.

Mr. HOOPER. I ask the Clerk to read what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

AN INTERESTING RELIC.

John R. Ward, esq., of Texas, has in his possession an interesting relic of the times of the Revolution. It is a watch bearing the inscription, "G. Washington, to Gilbert Mottiers de La Fayette, Lord Cornwallis capitulation, Yorktown, October 17, 1781." The watch is of the shape known as "bull's eye," which was the fashionable one at that period, and is heavily double-cased with gold of high purity. The exterior case is ornamented with classic devices in high relief; an armed and helmetted warrior presents a crown to a throned female. The watch bears the name of the maker, "E. Halifax, London, 1769." It is in a good state of preservation, runs, and, with treatment after the manner of Captain Cuttle, keeps excellent time. It was purchased by Mr. Ward at a pawn-broker's sale in Louisville, about four years ago, for the sum of seventy-five dollars, who retains it subject to the order of any of the descendants of its illustrious donee. According to the statement of General Rogers, of Tennessee, who was commander of the body-guard of General La Fayette during his visit to Nashville in 1825, this watch was stolen from its owner at that time and its fate was unknown, although a large reward was offered for its return, until it turned up in the way above described.

Mr. MAYNARD. The statement just made is historically true. General La Fayette visited this country not long before he died, if I remember rightly, in the years 1824 and 1825. In the course of his journey through the country he went to Nashville, where this watch, which had been presented to him by General Washington and which he seems to have worn as a pocket time-piece, disappeared and undoubtedly was stolen. Great efforts were made to recover it, and if I remember rightly large rewards were offered. The people of Nashville felt mortified and humiliated that such an occurrence should have happened in their community; but the watch disappeared and was forgotten until some time since, when it found its way into a pawnbroker's establishment in the city of Louisville, Kentucky. I have this to say in behalf of the people of Tennessee: that if the matter had been brought to the attention of the Legislature of that State I am very sure they would have desired, so far as they could, to have made an appropriation in order to recover this watch and restore it to the family of La Fayette. But as this bill has been brought in here it becomes a matter of national interest rather than of local interest.

Mr. GARFIELD. There is only one question about this joint resolution that should cause any hesitation in voting for it; but I think it due to all concerned to make the inquiry whether this watch is genuine? Of course if it is genuine such a resolution as this ought to be passed; but everybody knows that there are frequent pretenses of antiquity in works of art and in matters of this description. I understand that the gentleman from Massachusetts has had this matter examined by experts at the Treasury Department and elsewhere, and he tells me that some of those experts have raised a question as to its genuineness.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. One of the experts raised a question as to its genuineness because the word "Motier" is spelled with two "t's" and a final "s;" but I say with all deference that it is well known that General Washington himself was not a very exact speller, and the engraver no doubt followed his spelling. I understand that this watch has been submitted to experts in the Treasury Department, and that they have examined it, and report that in their judgment it is genuine.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the only argument against the genuineness of the watch is the spelling of the inscription I admit that is not very strong, for it is well known that Washington did not excel in spelling. Even Franklin, who was his superior in scholarship, spelled very irregularly; for example, he spelled soap "sope."

No objection being made, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 113) received its several readings and was passed.

UNIVERSITY FOR THE BLIND.

On motion of Mr. MONROE, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Education and Labor was discharged from the further consideration of the memorial in favor of aiding the American Printing House and University for the Blind; and the same was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

On the motion of Mr. DAWES, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Ways and Means was discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of the board of regents of the American University, &c., for the Blind, setting forth the needs of the blind as to means of improvement and the obligation of Congress to aid in providing facilities for liberal education as has been done for deaf-mutes; and the same was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

FAYETTE HUNGERFORD.

On motion of Mr. DAWES, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Ways and Means was discharged from the further consideration of the petition for relief in the case of Fayette Hungerford; and leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in said case.

NELSON TIFFANY.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Military Affairs the bill (H. R. No. 447) for the relief of Nelson Tiffany. I would state that it is the unanimous report of the committee, and I would not trouble the House with it but for the fact that it is to remove a charge of desertion from a soldier who, as I am told by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR,] is now upon his death-bed.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of War to remove the charge of desertion from Nelson Tiffany, late a private in Company H, Twenty-fifth Massachusetts Volunteers, and to grant to said Tiffany an honorable discharge.

No objection being made, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

COMPULSORY PILOTAGE.

Mr. E. R. HOAR, by unanimous consent, presented resolutions of the Legislature of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts relative to compulsory pilotage at Hell Gate; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

UNITED STATES CUSTOM-HOUSE AT LOUISVILLE, KENTUCKY.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2109) for the protection of the United States custom-house in the city of Louisville, Kentucky, and that the same be passed.

The bill was read. The preamble recites that the strip of ground thereinafter described is indispensable to the preservation of the United States custom-house, to prevent destruction by fire, and to prevent obstruction of the lights and ventilation thereof in one of its most important fronts.

The bill empowers and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase from the owner or owners thereof, at a price not to exceed $12,500, all that certain piece of ground in the city of Louisville, county of Jefferson, and State of Kentucky, situate west of and adjoining the United States custom-house, fronting twenty-five feet on Green street, and extending back one hundred and fifty feet, parallel with and the same depth as the custom-house property; and for that purpose the sum of $12,500, or so much thereof as shall be necessary, is thereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; provided, however, that no part of the money thereby appropriated shall be paid or expended until a clear, perfect, and absolute title in fee-simple to the ground shall have been secured and conveyed to the United States by a good and sufficient deed of general warranty.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

EAST TENNESSEE UNIVERSITY.

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of Senate bill No. 110, for the relief of the East Tennessee University, and that the same be now passed. It is a bill which has been reported favorably from the Committee on War Claims.

The bill directs the Treasurer of the United States to pay to the president of the East Tennessee University the sum of $18,500 in full compensation for aid given by and on behalf of said university to the Army of the United States in the late war of the rebellion; provided that before said sum shall be paid a release in full of all claims against the Government by said East Tennessee University shall be executed in due form by the proper officers thereof, and deposited with the Treasurer, along with a receipt of the money appropriated by the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope there will be some explanation of this bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. If I can be permitted to do so, I will make a brief statement.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman will explain why the form of the bill has been changed from what it was last session.

Mr. MAYNARD. A bill for this purpose was passed by the last Congress. A bill for a similar purpose has three times received the approval of the Senate. The first time it was too late to be acted upon by the House. In the last Congress it was passed by the two Houses and vetoed by the President. The veto was not upon the merits of the bill but upon the form of the bill. Upon examining the claim the President held it was one which would meet his approval, and indicated by his Private Secretary a form of bill which to his mind would be unobjectionable. That form was adopted by the Senate, which passed the bill, and the Committee on War Claims of this House have reported it favorably. That claim arises out of the use and occupation of the property of the university after it came within the Federal lines for hospital and military purposes. The money to restore the property to its former condition was borrowed by the university, and they are now paying interest on it at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum.

Mr. ATKINS. I would inquire if the Committee on War Claims of this House have not reported upon this bill favorably?

Mr. MAYNARD. I have so stated.

Mr. KELLOGG. Certainly, they have.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would like to hear the report read, if there is one.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I should like to say a word or two about this matter.

Mr. MAYNARD. I will not consume the further time of the House by discussion of this bill. If there is objection made I will move that the rules be suspended and the bill passed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] will have the letter read showing why the form of the bill has been changed.

Mr. KELLOGG. I desire to say that the only objection to the old bill was that it might be made a precedent for other claims. The Committee on War Claims thought this bill ought to pass.

Mr. HOLMAN. As the bill formerly passed it was for spoliation and damage done to the property; in that form it was vetoed. Now the bill is changed so as to appropriate money for aid furnished by the university to the Government of the United States.

The history of this claim against the Government is remarkable. At the last session of Congress it passed in the following words:

An act for the relief of the East Tennessee University.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Treasurer of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the trustees of the East Tennessee University the sum of $18,500, in full compensation for all claims which could be made by said university for all damages caused to its buildings at Knoxville, Tennessee: Provided, That before said sum shall be paid a release in full of all claims against the Government for all damages that might or could be claimed by said East Tennessee University on account of said buildings, shall be executed in due form by the proper officers of said university, and deposited with the Treasurer along with the receipt for the money hereby appropriated.

J. G. BLAINE,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
SCHUYLER COLFAX,
Vice-President of the United States, and President of the Senate.

I certify that this act did originate in the Senate.

GEO. C. GORHAM,
Secretary.

The President returned the bill with the following veto message:

To the Senate of the United States:

I have the honor to return herewith Senate bill No. 490, entitled "An act for the relief of the East Tennessee University," without my approval.

This claim, for which $18,500 are appropriated out of the moneys of the United States, arises in part for the destruction of property by troops in time of war, and therefore the same objections attach to it as were expressed in my message of June 1, 1872, returning the Senate bill awarding $25,000 to J. Milton Best.

If the precedent is once established that the Government is liable for the ravages of war, the end of demands upon the public Treasury cannot be forecast.

The loyalty of the people of the section in which the university is located, under circumstances of personal danger and trials, thus entitling them to the most favorable construction of the obligation of the Government toward them, is admitted; and nothing but regard for my duty to the whole people, in opposing a principle which, if allowed, will entail greater burdens upon the whole than the relief which will be afforded to a part, by allowing this bill to become a law, could induce me to return it with objections.

Recognizing the claims of these citizens to sympathy, and the most favorable consideration of their claims by the Government, I would heartily favor a donation, of the amount appropriated by this bill, for their relief.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
January 29, 1873.

Among the papers that came with this bill from the Senate are the following:

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, D. C., February 3, 1873.

SIR: The President directs me to say that the inclosed draught of a bill is what he would be willing to approve in the case of the East Tennessee University.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

O. E. BABCOCK,
Secretary.

Hon. HORACE MAYNARD,
House of Representatives.

A bill for the relief of the East Tennessee University.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Treasurer of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the president of the East Tennessee University the sum of $18,500, in full compensation for aid given by and on behalf of said university to the Army of the United States in the late war of the rebellion: Provided, That before said sum shall be paid a release in full of all claims against the Government by said East Tennessee University shall be executed in due form, by the proper officers thereof, and deposited with the Treasurer along with the receipt of the money hereby appropriated.

By the one bill this university is to be paid $18,500 "for all damages caused to its buildings at Knoxville, Tennessee," by the Army of the United States; and by the bill now pending $18,500 "for aid given by and on behalf of said university to the Army of the United States." And this change in the form of the bill is to change the result, the one subject to the veto and the other entitled to approval. And yet the real thing remains unchanged. Can it be possible that the mere change in phraseology of the bill can affect the quality of this claim against the Government?

Mr. KELLOGG. It is all right.

Mr. HOLMAN. The bill upon its face ought to express truly what the appropriation is for.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object to the request that the bill be now passed?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The motion to suspend the rules was seconded; and the rules were suspended upon a division, ayes 114, noes not counted, (two-thirds voting in favor thereof,) and the bill was passed.

Mr. MAYNARD. I will ask that the communication to which I referred, together with the form of bill therein recommended, be printed in the RECORD as a portion of the debates.

No objection was made, and it was so ordered.

[The communication and form of bill were as follows:

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, D. C., February 3, 1873.

SIR: The President directs me to say that the inclosed draught of a bill is what he would be willing to approve in the case of the East Tennessee University:

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

O. E. BABCOCK,
Secretary.

Hon. HORACE MAYNARD,
House of Representatives.

[Inclosure.]

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Treasurer of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the president of the East Tennessee University the sum of $18,500, in full compensation for aid given by and on behalf of said university to the Army of the United States in the late war of the rebellion: Provided, That before said sum shall be paid, a release in full of all claims against the Government by said East Tennessee University shall be executed in due form by the proper officers thereof, and deposited with the Treasurer, along with the receipt of the money hereby appropriated.]

EASTERN OR NORTH CAROLINA CHEROKEES.

Mr. VANCE. I ask consent that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of a bill (H. R. No. 3000) for the relief of Samuel W. Davidson, Henry Smith, John Gray Bynum, and others, and that the same be now passed.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $4,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, on account of expenses incurred by Silas H. Swetland, as special agent to settle with the Eastern or North Carolina Cherokees, in the year 1869, amounts to be found due to the following-named persons, to wit: Samuel W. Davidson, Henry Smith, N. J. Smith, J. D. Abbott, M. C. King, John Gray Bynum, and to others whose claims may be filed and verified.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Does that bill come from any committee?

Mr. VANCE. It comes from the Committee on Indian Affairs, and is also recommended by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. GARFIELD. Is it the unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. VANCE. It is.

Mr. GARFIELD. How much money is there in it?

Mr. VANCE. There is not over $4,500; it is all right and correct.

No objection was made, and the Committee of the Whole was discharged from its further consideration, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. VANCE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire to have a joint resolution passed.

Mr. TYNER. I give notice that after the joint resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TOWNSEND] shall have been disposed of, I will not yield to any person except to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. STARKWEATHER] to move to proceed to business on the Speaker's table.

LOWER PIER, CHESTER, PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I ask unanimous consent that the rules be suspended to pass the joint resolution (H. R. No. 108) in regard to the lower pier at Chester, Pennsylvania.

The joint resolution was read. It instructs the Secretary of War to have an examination made of the lower pier at Chester, Pennsylvania, by a competent engineer, with a view to ascertain whether it would be to the advantage of the Government to have said pier adapted to the purposes of supplying Government vessels with coal, iron, and other general supplies, and to have made an estimate of the probable cost of such adaptation, and to report the result of such examination to Congress.

There being no objection, the rules were suspended, and the joint resolution was passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. TYNER] who is now on the floor to report the Senate amendments to the post-office appropriation bill yields to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. STARKWEATHER] who desires to make an arrangement to dispose of business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. We have tried, and could not go to the Speaker's table, making any exception, to dispose of bills by a majority vote. I now move that we go to the Speaker's table unconditionally, and that a two-thirds vote be required to pass any bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. STARKWEATHER] asks that bills on the Speaker's table may be taken up seriatim under the two-thirds rule, each bill being exactly on the same basis as every other bill.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. Either to be passed or to remain on the Speaker's table.

Mr. POTTER. Will the Chair please state the effect of this proposition?

The SPEAKER. The effect of it would be that no bill could be disposed of except by a two-thirds vote.

Mr. POTTER. And any bill failing to obtain such a vote would remain on the table?

The SPEAKER. Yes, sir. Is there any objection to proceeding to dispose of bills on the Speaker's table seriatim under that arrangement?

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust it will be understood that if a bill be not sustained by a two-thirds vote it shall be regarded as rejected.

The SPEAKER. Failing to obtain a two-thirds vote any bill would naturally retain the status out of which it failed to be taken by a two-thirds vote.

Mr. HOLMAN. But if a bill does not receive a majority vote, it should be regarded as rejected.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will observe that his proposition would not be either parliamentary or just. The proposition is to take up bills seriatim; and any bill not disposed of by two-thirds would be left without prejudice just where it now is, on the Speaker's table.

Mr. HOLMAN. My point is that there are some bills on the Speaker's table which it is very desirable to dispose of finally at this session of Congress. But I see the embarrassment in the way of carrying out my proposition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana would not propose that a minority of the House should have power to reject a bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Not a minority but a majority. I suggested that if a bill did not receive a majority vote, it should be regarded as rejected.

The SPEAKER. That would be a complicated arrangement.

Mr. RAINEY. I hope that will not be agreed to. It is unjust.

The SPEAKER. The proposition as submitted puts every bill on precisely the same basis.

Mr. POTTER. I understand the present proposition is to consider the bills on the Speaker's table seriatim, subject to the rules of the House.

The SPEAKER. That is the proposition. If the House makes no arrangement to go to the Speaker's table the Speaker will necessarily be compelled still to decline to recognize individual members desiring to take bills from the Speaker's table, because he cannot exercise a favoritism in that regard.

Mr. AVERILL. Does this proposition admit of any discussion on these bills?

The SPEAKER. The motion as now submitted would not admit of discussion, although some provision of that kind might be attached to it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think the better course is to go to the Speaker's table in the ordinary way.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. If two-thirds of the House desire to go to the Speaker's table they can do so, and then a majority vote can pass any bill. [Cries of "No!" "No!"] I understand what I am talking about. I say that if two-thirds of the House desire to go to business on the Speaker's table they can do so, and then a majority can pass any bill. But under the proposition of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. STARKWEATHER] every bill taken up will fail unless it can obtain a two-thirds vote.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will observe that no bill has been taken from the Speaker's table out of its order since the last ten days of the session began.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I understand that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has declined to recognize any gentleman to move to take any particular bill from the Speaker's table, and he will so decline until the end of the session, unless the House shall direct him in what manner to proceed.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. But two-thirds can go to the Speaker's table to dispose of the business there.

The SPEAKER. Certainly; and if the gentleman from Connecticut will yield that issue can be tried.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I make that motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves that the rules be suspended and that the House proceed to dispose of business on the Speaker's table. This, of course, will leave every bill subject to be disposed of by a majority vote of the House.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The proposition of the gentleman from Iowa is that the rules be suspended and the House proceed to the business upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. KASSON. The parliamentary inquiry I wish to make is this: If the House should reach the Speaker's table will a single objection to a bill involving an appropriation carry that bill under the rules to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to have its first consideration?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. ELDREDGE. When we get to the Speaker's table under a suspension of the rules, can any bill be passed by a majority vote of the House?

The SPEAKER. It can, unless subjected to the point of order stated by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] that it involves an appropriation and must under the rules have its first consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. POTTER. If the present motion be voted down, will not the motion of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. STARKWEATHER] then be in order?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the House will allow the amendments of the Senate to the post-office appropriation bill to be first acted on.

Mr. KILLINGER. These amendments are excepted by the present motion.

The question recurred on seconding the motion to suspend the rules.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, and Mr. POTTER were appointed.

Mr. CONGER. As this is a test question, I hope we will have the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The rules do not permit the yeas and nays on seconding the motion to suspend the rules.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 108, noes 100.

So the motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. AVERILL. Will all the bills lying on the Speaker's table be liable to the ordinary points of order?

The SPEAKER. They will.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LYNCH. If this motion should be decided in the affirmative, and a point of order should be made against any bill when reached upon the Speaker's table, would not a motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill be in order?

The SPEAKER. It would.

Mr. LYNCH. That removes one objection.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 139, nays 111, not voting 39; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Barber, Barrere, Barry, Bass, Begole, Bradley, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Casón, Cessna, Amos Clark, jr., Stephen A. Cobb, Coburn, Conger, Corwin, Cotton, Crocker, Crooke, Crounse, Crutchfield, Curtis, Darrall, Dawes, Dobbins, Donnan, Duell, Eames, Field, Foster, Frye, Garfield, Gooch, Gunckel, Eugene Hale, Benjamin W. NOT VOTING—Messrs. Freeman Clarke, Clayton, Clinton L. Cobb, DeWitt, Eden, Elliott, Farwell, Freeman, Hagans, Robert S. Hale, Harmer, Havens, Hersey, Lewis, Alexander S. McDill, McNulta, Mitchell, Morey, Myers, Isaac C. Parker, Phillips, Pratt, William R. Roberts, John G. Schumaker, Henry J. Scudder, Sessions, Shanks, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloan, George L. Smith, William A. Smith, Stephens, Swann, Taylor, Charles R. Thomas, Waddell, Wheeler, Wilber, and Jeremiah M. Wilson—39.

So (two-thirds not having voted in the affirmative) the rules were not suspended, and the motion was not agreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri, stated he was paired with Mr. WADDELL, of North Carolina.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I now renew my motion that the House proceed to the business upon the Speaker's table and take up the bills seriatim under the two-thirds rule.

The SPEAKER. The failure in that event to second the demand for a suspension of the rules will of course leave the bill upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will it not be the fairest way to take up first those bills which will not be objected to?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee suggests before the House proceeds to take the bills on the Speaker's table by a two-thirds vote that the bills be run through to which there is no objection.

Mr. COX. Can bills be referred under that order?

The SPEAKER. By a two-thirds vote.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. We ran through the unanimous consents the other day.

The SPEAKER. But since then a great many bills have gone upon the Speaker's table. Will the House now proceed to the business upon the Speaker's table and take up the bills seriatim under a two-thirds vote?

Mr. KASSON. If there be no objection, I suggest there be allowed five minutes' time to any member who wishes to oppose a bill.

The SPEAKER. It would take three weeks to go through the business on the Speaker's table in that way.

The motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

The rules were suspended, (two-thirds voting in favor thereof,) and the order was made.

The SPEAKER. The order will continue until the bills on the Speaker's table are exhausted.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. BURROWS. I ask unanimous consent to make a personal explanation, which will not occupy more than a single minute.

There was no objection.

Mr. BURROWS. Last Tuesday, when the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] moved to go to the Speaker's table to dispose of business thereon with the exception of the civil-rights bill, I took occasion to inquire why he excepted that bill. In doing so I had no purpose to question the gentleman's friendship for the bill or to intimate that he was hostile to it. The position of the honorable gentleman is too well known to the House and the country to justify any such supposition. I did him no such injustice.

An act (H. R. No. 1206) for the relief of Charles J. Sands, of Brooklyn, New York;

An act (H. R. No. 2064) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June, 30, 1875, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. No. 2292) for the relief of William Walker;

An act (H. R. No. 2398) granting a medal to John Horn, jr., for his heroic exploits in rescuing men, women, and children from drowning in Detroit River;

ARMY PENSION DEFICIENCY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication just received from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a letter of the Commissioner of Pensions, representing the necessity for a deficiency appropriation of $200,000 for the payment of Army pensions during the current fiscal year.

Mr. GARFIELD. Would it be in order to move to refer that communication to the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the deficiency appropriation bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know why it would not be.

Mr. GARFIELD. I make that motion. I wish to inquire whether this will give the conference committee jurisdiction, if there should be no amendment pending between the two Houses touching any such subject?

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair it would, if it is an actual, legal deficiency; in that case the bill by its title would cover this subject.

Mr. HOLMAN. I submit that the committee of conference would have no jurisdiction, unless this matter should be germane to some amendment made by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The deficiency bill embraces all items of public service in which there may occur a legitimate deficiency. The Chair therefore thinks that this matter would be within the jurisdiction of the conference committee. At all events the communication may be referred; and that point if necessary can be brought up afterward.

The motion of Mr. GARFIELD was agreed to.

POLITICAL DISTURBANCES IN ARKANSAS.

Mr. TYNER. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] on the condition that the proposition he is about to submit shall not consume time.

Mr. POLAND. I have been directed by the select committee on the condition of affairs in Arkansas to report back certain testimony taken on that subject, and also to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the select committee of the House appointed under a resolution adopted May 27, 1874, to inquire into the disturbed condition of governmental affairs in the State of Arkansas, be continued during the recess of Congress, with the same powers conferred by the resolution under which said committee was appointed.

The question being taken on agreeing to the resolution, there were—ayes 51, noes 52; no quorum voting.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. TYNER. I yielded to the gentleman from Vermont with the understanding that this proposition should not take time.

Mr. POLAND. That was the understanding, and I withdraw the resolution for the present.

The SPEAKER. It can come up immediately after the post-office appropriation bill is disposed of.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. TYNER I move that the House now proceed to the consideration of the amendments of the Senate to the bill making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, and that they be considered in the House under the five-minute rule.

The motion was agreed to.

The first amendment was read, as follows:

In the proviso relating to employment of letter-carriers strike out "twenty thousand" and insert "thirty thousand;" so that the paragraph will read as follows:

For pay of letter-carriers, $1,900,000: Provided, That hereafter letter-carriers shall not be employed for the free delivery of mail matter in towns and cities whose population within their corporate limits, as shown by the last report of the national census or by any subsequent census taken in pursuance of State statute or by order of the mayor and common council of such town or city, shall be less than thirty thousand; but this proviso shall not affect the free delivery in towns and cities where it is now established.

The Committee on Appropriations recommended concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

The second amendment was read, as follows.

Add to the paragraph in regard to the pay and employment of letter carriers the following:

And for the more efficient management of the free-delivery system, the Postmaster-General may designate a fourth-class clerk to act as superintendent of free delivery in the Post-Office Department at an annual salary of $2,500; and for this purpose the sum of $700 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The Committee on Appropriations recommended concurrence.

Mr. HOLMAN. On concurring in this amendment I ask for a division. It makes an increase of salary.

The question being taken, the amendment was non-concurred in; there being ayes 25, noes not counted.

The third amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out the words "running out of the District of Columbia" and insert the words "in Virginia and Maryland;" so that the paragraph will read as follows:

For advertising, $80,000: Provided, That hereafter no payment shall be made to any newspaper published in the District of Columbia for advertising any other routes than those in Virginia and Maryland.

The Committee on Appropriations recommended concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

The fourth amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out the words "and no" and insert "nor any;" so as to make the paragraph read as follows:

For stamped envelopes and wrappers, $535,424: Provided, That hereafter no envelope, as furnished by the Government, shall contain any lithographing and engraving, nor any printing except a printed request to return the letter to the writer.

The Committee on Appropriations recommended concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

The fifth amendment was read, as follows:

In the paragraph appropriating for miscellaneous items $2,500, strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That the monthly and annual reports of the Department of Agriculture shall pass free through the mails.

The Committee on Appropriations recommended non-concurrence.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

The sixth amendment was read, as follows:

Insert the following as a new paragraph:

For the purchase of law-books for the library of the office of the Assistant Attorney-General of the Post-Office Department, $2,000.

The Committee on Appropriations recommended non-concurrence.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

The seventh amendment was read, as follows:

Insert the following as a new section:

That the revised statutes of the United States shall not be published by the United States in any newspaper, anything in existing laws to the contrary notwithstanding.

The Committee on Appropriations recommended concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

The eighth amendment was read, as follows:

Insert as a new section, the following:

SEC. 5. That on all newspapers and periodical publications mailed from a known office of publication or news agency, and addressed to regular subscribers or news agents, postage shall be charged at the following rates: On newspapers and periodical publications, four cents for each pound or fraction thereof: Provided, That the rate of postage on newspapers or periodicals, not exceeding two ounces in weight, and circulars, when the same are deposited in a letter-carrier office for delivery by the office or its carriers, shall be uniform at one cent each; but periodicals weighing more than two ounces shall be subject to a postage of two cents each, and these rates shall be prepaid by stamp.

The Committee on Appropriations recommended concurrence in the Senate amendment, with an amendment, to make the section read as follows:

SEC. 5. That on all newspapers and periodical publications mailed from a known office of public ation or news agency, and addressed to regular subscribers or news agents, postage shall be charged at the following rates: On newspapers and periodical publications, issued weekly and more frequently than once a week, one cent and five mills for each pound or fraction thereof; and on those issued less frequently than once a week three cents for each pound or fraction thereof: Provided, That the rate of postage on transient newspapers or periodicals, not exceeding two ounces in weight, and circulars, when the same are deposited in a letter-carrier office for delivery by the office or its carriers, shall be uniform at one cent each; but periodicals weighing more than two ounces, sent to other than regular subscribers or news agents shall be subject to a postage of two cents each, and these rates shall be prepaid by stamp.

Mr. KASSON. It seems to me there is an error in the insertion of the word "transient" before the word "newspapers" if the proviso relates exclusively to papers, &c., sent for delivery by letter-carriers within the delivery of that office. The intention of the clause, I presume, is to subject such papers, whether transient or continuous, to the payment of one cent, because delivered by letter-carriers. I think, therefore, the word "transient" is an error.

Mr. TYNER. I think the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] is mistaken. The first part of this section provides for the rate of postage on newspapers, which rate is of course to be prepaid. After fixing the rate of postage the proviso then goes on and declares that newspapers or periodicals not exceeding a certain weight shall go through the mails at a certain rate. The proviso, unless there is some qualifying term, will change the rate of postage fixed in the first part of the section.

The purpose evidently of the Senate was to provide the law as it now exists should be continued, and in order to avoid any mistake or misapprehension as to the first part of the section the Senate evidently intended to make a different rate of postage, or rather intended to continue the present rate of postage on transient matter. To make that purpose clear the Committee on Appropriations thought it necessary to insert the word "transient" before the word "newspapers." If the gentleman from Iowa will turn to the first part of the section he will see that it provides for sending newspapers and periodicals and publications mailed from a known office of publication or news agency and addressed to regular subscribers or news agents. That does not apply to outsiders, but only to subscribers or news agents. Without some such proposition as we have inserted the publisher or news dealer may send his transient mail-matter all over the country at the rate fixed in the first part of the section, and therefore the proviso changes the rate upon transient newspapers or periodicals from the rate fixed in the first part when the same is deposited in a letter-carrier office for delivery.

Mr. KASSON. I think what the gentleman from Indiana says implies that provision should be put somewhere, but the word "transient" where it is put relates exclusively to those newspapers or periodicals deposited in letter-carrier offices for delivery by the office or its carriers. Consequently if the word "transient" is left where it is it would leave these newspapers and periodicals to be sent within the local delivery subject to a postage, which it is not the intention of this committee to allow. I suggest that should be considered in the conference. Suppose instead of being transient the publishing office or news agent in New York chooses to send through the local office every day by the letter-carriers, then it would imply if they were regular issues and not transient they should come under the previous rate per pound, which it is not the intention to do, as I understand.

Mr. TYNER. Inasmuch as this can be determined more correctly by the conference, I have no objection to striking out the word "transient," where it is proposed to be put before "newspapers," and also in the latter part to strike out "sent to others than regular subscribers or news agents," and let the vote be taken on the balance of the section.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. What does the gentleman now propose to do? I should like to understand it.

Mr. TYNER. I propose to strike out the work "transient" before the word "newspapers," and also to strike out the words "sent to others than regular subscribers or news agents" after the word "ounces" in line 11. That will leave the proviso precisely as it came from the Senate.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. A newspaper published in a town which has a letter-carrier office would be obliged to pay three cents for postage, whereas if it went over to the next town in the same county it would go free.

Mr. TYNER. The gentleman will see by turning to section 7 it is there provided that newspapers, one copy to each actual subscriber residing within the county where the same are printed in whole or in part and published, shall go free through the mails; but the same shall not be delivered at letter-carrier offices or distributed by carriers unless postage is paid thereon as by law provided.

The provision to which the gentleman has called my attention simply requires the prepayment of postage where there is letter-carrier delivery of newspapers or periodicals.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Do you provide the daily newspapers shall go through the mails free?

Mr. TYNER. Not at all; but we propose, if the publisher of a daily paper shall send copies of his publication to subscribers to be delivered by letter-carriers, then postage shall be paid on them. But if the publisher of a daily paper shall send his paper through the post-office alone to a subscriber in the county, then this bill provides it shall go free. We only propose to charge postage to cover the service of the letter-carrier system.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Do you propose that it shall go free in a city where the letter-carrier system is established?

Mr. TYNER. Provided it is delivered at the post-office but not by the letter-carrriers. The gentleman from Connecticut would not ask the passage of a law to load down the letter-carriers with daily papers to go through the mails and be delivered by these letter-carriers free of postage.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I think we are wrong in allowing a single ounce of mail matter to go free anywhere. If you made everybody in the country pay for every service rendered by the Post-Office Department you could reduce the newspaper rates below what they now are. The effect of the law as the House proposes to amend it is to offer the highest kind of protective duties for county weeklies and for county papers. You permit them to go entirely free through the mails and then you turn around and put a heavy burden upon the publishers of papers of more extended circulation and make them pay the expense of delivery of the entire newspaper press of the country. If you take the ground that no matter shall pass through the mails free, and stand upon it, and let all papers pay each in its own county as well as everywhere else—let every man who has an advantage from the Government pay for it—you can then put your rates down to one cent instead of anything going free, you can then reduce postage to the lowest rates possible.

Mr. POTTER. Does this provide for prepayment of postage on the part of newspapers circulating in the counties?

Mr. TYNER. There is no recommendation in regard to that by the House Committee on Appropriations. The House is now considering the amendments of the Senate to this bill.

I will say, Mr. Speaker, that nearly all the remainder of this bill is simply a copy of certain changes which the House has already passed in the shape of two or three different bills that were reported here by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. There are certain changes, however, that have been made by the Senate in which the Committee on Appropriations of this House recommend non-concurrence.

And now let me say a word in reply to the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY.] We have come nearly to the plan of requiring prepayment on nearly all classes of mailable matter. It is true that certain newspapers are permitted to go free in the mail in the counties of their publication. But there is so small a proportion of them that get into the mails at all that it may be said that even they do not vary the rule. For instance, the weekly newspaper in the county almost invariably delivers two-thirds or three-fourths of its circulation to its subscribers in the town or city where published. These newspapers are carried by the majority of the publishing houses to the post-office and never go into the mails, but are delivered at the delivery window of the post-office. A very few, a very small percentage, go into the mails and are carried short distances of from one to fifteen miles. That small proportion, I repeat, scarcely changes the rule. So that we have come down almost to the rule requiring everything that enters the mail to pay postage, and to prepay it also.

The daily newspaper stands precisely on the same footing with the weekly newspaper in regard to weekly circulation within the county. And I apprehend that the sober reflection of nearly all gentlemen here will bear me out in saying that this change in the law—a change in the law which has been in existence only for a year past—re-establishing the principle of free circulation within counties, is really right, in order not to impose a tax on the circulation of that class of intelligence which is the most unable to pay it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire my colleague, the gentleman from Indiana, to state what amount of increase is made in newspaper postage by the House bill over the present law, and how much by the Senate amendments.

Mr. TYNER. The present law, as the gentleman is aware, provides for a rate of postage on weeklies and semi-weeklies and dailies in proportion to the frequency of their publication. As nearly as the Post-Office Department has been able to reduce it to the cost per pound, this is a reduction, a very considerable reduction upon the postage on newspapers. But the change of providing for a prepayment, thus enabling the Department to collect all its revenues on this matter, has in my judgment, and I make the statement after very considerable reflection about it, reduced the actual cost per pound nearly or about 50 per cent., and will pay an increased postage or revenue to the Post-Office Department to the extent of not less than 300 per cent.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to ask my colleague what is the effect of the Senate amendment making the rate four cents per pound?

Mr. TYNER. The effect of that, in my judgment, would be to increase the rates of postage at least 200 per cent., and in some instances more than that, over the proposition heretofore adopted by the House. And another effect in my judgment will grow out of that. If we fix the rate of postage at four cents, so high a rate as that will induce all the publishing offices of the country to resort almost exclusively to the express companies for the delivery of their newspapers on short routes and within short distances, and will also induce them to send their publications through the mail when they have to be carried long distances, the result of which will be in my judgment to cheat the Post-Office Department out of a large proportion of the revenues that it now gets, and to enhance the revenues of the express companies in proportion.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I desire to make another suggestion as to what will be the effect of this Senate amendment, charging four cents a pound, which is a most extraordinary, extravagant, and unreasonable increase of the rate of postage. One other effect would be, as it is of the present law, to throw the whole burden of the postage on the publishers of the newspapers. That is the effect of the law. You say the publisher will get it out of his subscribers. You are by this law to levy—how much? Two million dollars?

Mr. TYNER. It will not amount to that.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. You expect an increase—I understand some two million dollars. That is all to come out of four, six, or eight hundred persons in the country—the whole of it. You change the mode of collecting from the subscriber to the newspapers and the men who publish them. And this is a tremendous tax upon a comparatively few people of the country.

Ah, but you say it is like the whisky tax, which does not come out of the distillers, but the drinkers of whisky have to pay it ultimately. You say that the subscribers will have to pay this postage. Not at all. The publishers of newspapers now charge for their papers one or two dollars a year; they cannot charge $1.08 or $1.09 so as to cover the postage. I tell you, as a newspaper publisher, that we shall not change our yearly rates at all, but we shall shoulder this enormous burden, ranging from any sum as small as you please up to $300,000 a year. I think there are newspaper establishments in the country that will pay $300,000 a year under this law; and it will be a long time before the matter can be so adjusted that the burden shall be divided between the publisher and the subscriber.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to oppose the amendment. I think the House may well devote some time to the consideration of this question in connection with four or five other amendments which follow it. They relate to one of the most important topics connected with our postal affairs that has yet been before Congress. We are here discussing not only the rate of postage on newspapers, but also the rate on merchandise, that question coming in in one of the Senate amendments. It is proposed by the Senate to put up the amount of merchandise that may be carried through the mails to four pounds. At present the amount is only twelve ounces. They propose to make it sixty-four ounces. The Senate proposes, also, to increase the charge for carrying newspapers to three or four times what it now is.

Mr. KASSON. These newspapers, to which the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] has alluded, according to my recollection raised their prices during the war to about double what they were before, and they have not since that time reduced the price. That is a point to be considered in connection with the alleged hardship upon newspaper publishers, in case they do not recover the whole amount from their subscribers.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. That is a matter with which Congress has nothing to do.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think Congress should ascertain the original and present object of the Post-Office Department. A novel and remarkable proposition was made before the Committee on Appropriations a few weeks ago by an able gentleman who appeared before them in regard to the postal telegraph. He insisted that the object of the Post-Office Department was not to transmit intelligence at all, but to carry packages; that it did not make any difference to the Government what was in the package, but that a sealed package, not above a certain weight should be carried by the Government at a low rate, and that the transmission of intelligence was only an incident resulting from the transmission of a package. I have had occasion, since that gentleman appeared before the committee, to inquire into this question historically to ascertain whether that was the object in the minds of our fathers when they created the Post-Office Department. I have copied the first resolution that I can find under the old Confederacy, and which originated our present Post-Office Department.

I find the first notice of the Post-Office in the Journal of the Confederation May 29, 1775, as follows:

> As the present critical situation of the Colonies renders it highly necessary that ways and means should be devised for the speedy and secure conveyance of intelligence from one end of the continent to the other—
> Resolved, That Mr. Franklin and others be a committee to consider the best means of establishing post for conveying letters and intelligence through this continent.

This, Mr. Speaker, was the corner-stone of our postal system. The report was read July 25, 1775, and agreed to July 26, and B. Franklin was appointed Postmaster-General, and a line of posts was established from Falmouth in Maine to Savannah, with as many cross-posts as the Postmaster-General should think fit.

In 1782 the first ordinance was passed regulating the post-office, with the following preamble: "Whereas the communication of intelligence with regularity and dispatch from one part to another of this United States is essentially requisite to the safety as well as the commercial interest," and the Congress being "vested with the sole and exclusive right and power of establishing and regulating post-offices throughout the United States:" therefore, &c., the Postmaster-General and his agents, &c., and no other person, "shall have the receiving, taking up, ordering, dispatching, sending post or with speed, carrying and delivering of any letters, packets, or other dispatches from any place within these United States for hire."

Such was the beginning of our postal system, which was organized for the purpose of transmitting intelligence, and not as an express for packages. The transmission of packages was authorized only because the packages contained intelligence.

Now, it is from this stand-point that I approach the question of postage on newspapers. We are met with this argument; we are told, and told truly, that 78 per cent. of all the matter that passes through the mails is newspapers, and that the newspapers paid during the last year a little more than $1,000,000 of the twenty-nine or thirty millions that were paid as postage, and yet the newspapers furnished over 78 per cent. of the weight of our mails. We could not defend that as a matter of justice, if it was the business of the Post-Office Department to carry packages as an express agency.

Now I take it that the Senate in their amendment have gone over to the express theory of the Post-Office Department. They have enlarged to four pounds the amount of merchandise of any sort that may be sent through the mails, and have raised the price of postage on newspapers to four cents per pound, at least treble the present rate. They have overthrown the theory upon which the post-office was founded, and propose to convert it into an express office. If that theory be the true one, then we ought to charge far more for transporting a newspaper than a letter, because it weighs more. If the theory of charging by weight and distance is to prevail, then as a matter of course the Senate is right, only they ought to have gone further and made the newspaper pay eight or ten times as much as a letter, in proportion as its weight is greater.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS obtained the floor.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to conclude this line of thought.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I will yield my time to the gentleman.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to call attention to another thing. In 1841 an attempt was made to readjust our postal system in regard to rates, and to make newspapers pay a larger share comparatively of the expenses of the Post-Office Department than they were then doing. The result of it all was that the rate of letter postage was decreased, while the rate of newspaper postage was kept substantially the same.

I have no doubt that upon the theory which the Senate seem to have adopted they have not gone even far enough. But I contend that the original theory, and the one which we ought to maintain, is that the Post-Office Department was created not for the purpose of revenue, but for the purpose of disseminating intelligence throughout the country. Therefore, where there is intelligence of so public a nature and of such general importance as that in the newspapers we give it the preference, and that is the reason why the newspaper should have the preference over the letter. I send a letter to a friend; it is a matter that concerns only him and me. But the news of the crops, of the business, of the commerce and the trade of the country is a matter that at once concerns millions of people. Therefore, for the public good, for the general welfare, the newspaper ought to be sent at a less cost than the private letter.

I am clear also that the Senate is right in one thing, and that is that the postage on newspapers should be prepaid. I have here the statistics of last year, which I think will be of some service to the House. In 1873 the actual legal charge for postage on newspapers amounted in the aggregate to $2,718,241. Yet there was collected and paid into the revenues of the Post-Office Department for postage on newspapers only $1,072,998, a little more than one-third of the legal charge. It is fair to say that substantially only about 30 per cent. of the entire legal charge of carrying the newspapers in the mails was paid. Why? I can give the House an illustration in my own district. I recollect seeing last fall a postmaster in a country office where the revenue of the office was very small; perhaps the fees of the office did not produce a salary of more than $100 per annum. The man said to me: "I collect a hundred accounts every quarter for postage on newspapers, or four hundred accounts a year, at nine cents each. In other words, I have to open four hundred accounts, each account amounting to only nine cents, and I must collect them. In doing so I have an infinite amount of trouble. A man comes in for his newspaper; he has not the money to pay the quarter's postage, or he cannot make the change, or I cannot make it, and I violate the law and let him have the paper for several weeks without paying the postage. He is a friend of mine; I do not want to make him angry, and finally I pay the postage out of my own pocket." Or, what is true in a great majority of cases, it is never paid, but returned as delinquencies. It is a miserable, trifling, little picayune business. We ought to fix the rate at that which we determine should be fixed, not a high rate; the Senate has fixed too high a rate, but the House has fixed a rate which is really a reduction. We ought to fix that rate, and stand by it, and provide that it shall be prepaid before the newspapers go into the mails.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I hope the gentleman did not understand me as opposing the prepayment of newspaper postage.

Mr. GARFIELD. O, no.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I do not know any one engaged in the business who does not think prepayment a wise and proper rule. And all that the gentleman has said about the annoying character of these little collections is true. But make your rate low, and you will get more money.

Mr. GARFIELD. The House will remember that some months ago we discussed the question of freedom of transmission of newspapers in the counties where published. I expressed my opinion on that subject, and as a result I have been very considerably criticised by those who thought I was attacking the metropolitan press and praising especially the country press. I argued then upon the same principle which Benjamin Franklin laid down when he organized the Post-Office Department, that it was for the diffusion of intelligence and not for revenue that the postal system was established. I said then and I say now, for I am confirmed in my belief, that no greater injustice can be done than to establish a dead-level rate of postage for newspapers in the counties where they are published. In fact, the first law that Franklin introduced made a discrimination based on distance; and I think it is worth while to refer to it here. The first notice of newspapers in our postal laws was in the ordinance of 1792. The service had existed about twenty years before the newspapers were recognized, they being so few in number and of such little weight in comparison with letters. But in 1792, few as newspapers then were in comparison with what they are now, it had become important to recognize them, and an ordinance was passed declaring—

> Newspapers shall be carried in a separate bag from letters, and charged one cent for one hundred miles and one and a half cents for a greater distance.
> Letters of course were rated much higher.

The newspaper continued to be an inconsiderable feature of the postal-service till about the end of the first quarter of the present century, but about that time the price of paper was greatly reduced, the size of newspapers greatly increased, and complaints were made by the Postmaster-General of the excessive weights of papers in proportion to the letters, and as early as 1838 an estimate was made of comparative weight of letters and papers sent from the five largest cities of the Union in a week. The weight of the letters were fourteen hundred and twenty-eight pounds and of the papers fifty-five thousand two hundred and forty-one pounds, while each letter paid an average twelve cents, and each paper one cent.

It was urged that it was unjust that letters should bear almost the entire expense of the Post-Office Department; that the postage on papers should be increased and that on letters diminished. The Postmaster-General in 1841 proposed an increase of 100 per cent. on the postage of printed matter converted into weight, with a reduction of 25 per cent. on letter-postage and prepayment on letters and papers.

To the advance of rates on papers it was replied that as the post-office was established for the diffusion of intelligence, and as newspapers performed that service for the public which letters did for the individual, and as the letter-postage was less than by any other means of conveyance, it was in the public interests that low rates on papers should be maintained. Congress therefore reduced the rates both on papers and letters, making them in each case depend on weight, and without regard to distance of transmission, requiring prepayment on letters but not on newspapers. With some modifications this has continued to be the law until the present time.

I think they were right to recognize as they did in the early days of the Government the difference between a local circulation and a general, wide-spread circulation of newspapers. If we propose by our legislation to do justice to the various interests of the country we ought to make some difference without respect.

I do not say as an independent question that the country newspapers ought to be free; that they have any special claims to total exemption from postage; but I do say that they have a right to have a difference made in their favor on the score of the small distances which they are transmitted. Of course the city newspapers are free within their respective counties as the country newspapers are. It was not merely for the country papers, but for relative justice that I pleaded when speaking on this subject several months ago.

I have no doubt it would be more just if we had a graded rate based upon the limits of distance and weight; yet that would be too cumbersome, and perhaps the order that is now adopted in this bill ought to stand. I wish, for one, to disclaim any purpose of assault on the newspapers on the one hand, or of toadying to them on the other. I stand by the old theory and traditions of the Government in regard to the Post-Office Department.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I move to amend the amendment presented by the committee by substituting one cent in place of one cent and a half, and two cents instead of three cents.

I recognize the force of the argument for prepayment; but I do not recognize the accuracy of the figures which are here presented. It is claimed that the postage upon newspapers carried through the mails during the past year would have been nearly $2,700,000, while the amount collected was but $1,072,000. Gentlemen have chosen to make a calculation based upon these figures; but I venture to say that their results are inaccurate. They can have no data to justify the estimate which has here been submitted. I do not question the honesty of their intentions; but they are making calculations about that which is necessarily uncertain, and they reach a conclusion which is absurd upon its face. The claim that there was a failure on the part of the postmasters to collect $1,700,000 of postage which should have been collected on newspapers should have taught them that their calculations are radically wrong.

The postage as it stands is so high as to drive a great many newspapers out of the mails. They are compelled to rely upon other facilities for reaching their subscribers, because the postage now is too high. They do not object to prepayment; but if you get all of this $2,700,000, (which is the calculation as to the amount that should be obtained from newspapers going through the mails,) if you have sure pay upon the newspapers, you can carry them for even a lower rate. The tendency of the present system, as the experience of gentlemen experienced in postal matters will testify, is to drive newspapers out of the mails for all short distances. Practically you carry in the mails only the newspapers that go a great ways. Now, if you want to get the profitable business for the mails, you must make your rates low enough to attract it; and in my judgment they ought not to be higher than one cent for weeklies and dailies, and two cents for magazines. Such a discrimination as now exists ought not to be made between magazines and newspapers, because the greater amount of business furnished by the dailies and weeklies places them within the range of a wholesale business; whereas the magazine postage, large as it is, must be in the aggregate very much less than the newspaper postage.

Gentlemen tell us a great deal about the weight of newspapers. Some of them are the very gentlemen who argued a while ago that weight made no difference at all, when they wanted agricultural reports carried for nothing. If that argument is sound, I would be glad to borrow some of the eloquent sentences of my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] who tried to teach us that it did not make any difference how much the mails weighed. But it does. What I want is that you shall fix some fair rate for a wholesale business when you ask for prepayment. That is all we ask.

The newspapers of this country do not want any sympathy from this body or any other body. They ask for justice; that is all. I know, Mr. Speaker, that this body, at least, is not going to legislate against newspapers out of spite. Bear in mind, gentlemen, great as you may be, and long as you may live, your career is short compared with the life of a great newspaper. The newspaper is an institution of this country, and there is no man so great that he can afford to sneer at it. I only choose now to say that the newspaper asks no favors, asks no sympathy. If you choose to legislate from spite you may, and newspapers will be carried outside of your mails.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I wish to refer to the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] for a moment before referring to what the gentleman from New York [Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS] has been talking about. I understand the gentleman from Ohio antagonizes the Senate amendment which provides that mailable matter of the third class may weigh not exceeding four pounds for each package, and postage shall be charged at the rate of one cent for each two ounces or fraction thereof. I claim that is a proper amendment. It is substantially the same provision contained in the bill passed by the House the other day which was reported from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. I claim it is right not only as a matter of justice to persons who live in portions of the country where there are no express offices, but it is right also as a matter of revenue for the Department, and whoever antagonizes an amendment of that kind, while he may not do it intentionally in favor of the express companies, nevertheless is in fact operating in their favor and against the convenience of the people of the country.

In seven of the principal cities last winter the mails were weighed for thirty days, and there were in round numbers one hundred and twenty thousand pounds of books and merchandise producing $20,000, of postage. For the same thirty days the newspapers and periodicals mailed in the same seven cities weighed four million pounds, which at a cent and a half a pound, the rate which the gentleman proposes to fix, would produce only $60,000, but which, if charged at the same rate as books and seeds and cuttings, would produce near half a million of dollars. Yet the gentleman from Ohio claims you should not carry four pound packages of third-class mailable matter which produces this kind of revenue. I say as a matter of justice to the people and as a matter of justice to the revenues of the Post-Office Department this third-class mailable matter should go through the mails as provided for in the amendment of the Senate.

But the gentleman from New York [Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS] says we have no data that the revenue would be $2,000,000 on papers and periodicals at the rate which is proposed shall be fixed by the committee. I say we have the data in the census report of 1870, and also in this weighing for thirty days in these seven principal cities of the country. Newspapers, periodicals in these principal cities for thirty days weighed four millions of pounds. For the entire year that would make 48,000,000 pounds for these seven cities alone. Calculation to produce $2,000,000 of revenue at the rate proposed is upon the basis of 97,000,000 of pounds. You will notice, therefore, that these seven principal cities would give over one-half of the amount necessary to produce this amount. Therefore I say you are not groping in the dark, but you can calculate with as great certainty as you can in reference to anything in the future not absolutely certain that there will be this amount of newspapers and periodicals going through the mails at this reduced rate.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. The gentleman from Illinois states that a certain amount was carried through the mails for a certain period, and then makes a calculation according to the census of 1870; is not that a guess?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. It is not a guess; the observation of postmasters and the ascertained facts show that it is correct, and such calculation is verified by the weighing of mails for thirty days in those seven principal cities.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. He weighed within a certain territory and found a certain result and doubled that result. I think that cannot be called anything else than a guess.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. No, sir; one fact verifies the other. If seven cities mail forty-eight million pounds of newspapers in a year, certainly the whole of the balance of the United States would mail as much more.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. His calculation is the result of a guess, very ingenious, perhaps, but nevertheless a guess.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The gentleman wants to have the last word. So be it.

Mr. G. F. HOAR rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No further amendment is in order.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I withdraw my amendment on condition the gentleman renews it.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I have listened to the distinguished gentleman from New York, [Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS]—his speech to-day and his speech on the general question some weeks ago—with less pleasure than that which I usually derive from what he has to say to the House, because it seems to me in discussing the effect of this legislation upon a portion of the people he has fallen into the common error of supposing his opponents influenced by a mean or low motive which may possibly enter some minds rather than by a general desire to do what is right and for the public interest.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. O, no.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. He said the other day in substance if the House expected to curry favor with the country press by giving them their newspapers free they were mistaken.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I say it now.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. He warns us now against legislating out of spite, and compares the length of the life of a great newspaper with the length of the career of a man in public station. But, Mr. Speaker, that is not the motive with which the gentlemen of this House are addressing themselves to this important public question. It is not in the least a question of the interest of the publisher of a newspaper. We have to deal with the question of the interest of the reader—the man who is to receive the newspaper. Now, the little local newspaper is a necessity of life to the people in the neighborhood where it is circulated. The widow, the laborer, and the poor man in the country like to have on Saturday night for the family reading the weekly newspaper which has the current county news, and the weekly newspapers are of such a class and the people who take them are of such a class, that the burden of postage may be a very serious burden in determining the question whether they can take the paper or not. On the other hand, the large daily newspaper of the metropolis is supported by the advertisements of the business and wealth of the country, and colossal fortunes are made by these long-lived newspapers after they once get established, while the little weekly newspapers perish like the leaves of the autumn.

The gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] an old newspaper publisher, declares that whatever may be the postage we put upon the city paper it makes no difference to the subscriber, but that the publisher would and could shoulder the entire burden. Now, therefore, it is important for us in our legislation to encourage as far as possible and as far as is necessary, by lightening the burden, the circulation of this information among the people by the press, with the influence it exerts in enabling the American people to govern themselves. The press of this country, Mr. Speaker, has a great power, a great educational influence. I recognize its power; I recognize its value. It has its errors, it has its sins, it has its crimes, it has its licentiousness, it has its recklessness. It also has its honest and generous support of what is good and true. The cure for the evil which to-day prevails in the American press, as in the press of every generation since newspapers have existed, is the multiplication and not the suppression of the circulation of the newspapers.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I should like to have just three minutes more.

Several MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. If the great newspaper of New York misrepresents the men in this House in their public conduct, thereby striking a blow at the very principle of self-government itself, because under the shadow of every calumny printed against the pure man ten knaves escape the just punishment of public indignation, and the knavery which exists—and it does exist—in our Government to-day is shielded by the unjust attacks made upon honest and faithful public servants, teaching people to look upon all public men as alike bad—if the great newspaper of the metropolis engages in that work of misrepresentation, the cure for that evil is to put by its side ten other newspapers of equal circulation, and out of these eleven or twelve newspapers the people will sooner or later learn to pick out the truth. I go, Mr. Speaker, for reducing the postage on both classes of newspapers to as low a rate as the public burdens and the state of the public service and the condition of the public Treasury will permit. And I trust my friend from New York, whom I honor as much as I do any man—there is no man whom I honor more on this floor—will not attribute to me either the desire to curry favor with the country newspaper or to wreak spite against the city paper when I give my vote.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, the newspapers of this country, as of all countries, must be made by men. The newspaper will have human frailties and will represent human passions. It would be fortunate for us if it were not also true that a legislative body represents human frailties and embodies human passions. For much of what the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] has said I thank him, because I know that the compliments he pays to the press are not mere words.

Now, the practical question is whether you are to make your postage so high as to be in the interest of the richest newspapers, or whether you will adopt such a rate as shall be in the interest of the Government, in the interest of the Post-Office Department.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I do not differ with the gentleman as to that.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I know that the gentleman from Massachusetts does agree with me as to the rates; and it seems to me that it is essential that we should adopt such a rate that it may not depend on the mere word of the gentleman from Massachusetts, good as that word is, to prove that we do not legislate out of spite. I know that newspapers sometimes indulge in unjust criticism, but they also often speak necessary and proper judgment. When their censure is not deserved, when it descends to slander, we must rely upon character to stand up against it—character which is above abuse, which adorns this Hall, and which is the safety of this Republic. I want the action of this body to be not only just, but to be so just that no fair man can complain of it. And therefore it seems to me that the amendment which I move presents the equitable and proper figure to adopt in this bill.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I wish to make a single remark. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. G. F. HOAR] did not quite do me justice in saying that I acknowledged or asserted that all this postage, now that it must be prepaid, must come out of the greater newspapers. That expression requires modification. I said it would not at present increase the rates of subscription. It would take a long time, I said, before the business so worked round as to get the money from the subscriber. But if those papers on the average pay now only a fair profit and this is a deduction from their fair profit, it is inevitable under the ordinary laws of business that in time they will come to collect all this from their subscribers. That unquestionably will be the result.

Now the hardship of this law is in the violence of the change and in the sudden concentration of a small tax upon a few persons. I therefore would like very well, and I think it would be better for the service in the long run, to begin with the low rates suggested by the gentleman from New York [Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS] even if we should collect no more revenue than now; and then in a year or two, after the business had been adjusted and if required by the exigencies of the public service, to increase it a trifle.

I say make it very low, because you change the method of collection. It had better be one or two cents per pound now, and then a year or two hence when the business adjusts itself you can add a cent or half a cent.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. Suppose we put it at one cent per pound, as proposed by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS,] does the gentleman from Connecticut suppose that any Congress will hereafter ever raise the rate of postage? Has such a thing ever been done?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I suppose Congress will raise it if they find they cannot afford to carry this matter at the rate now fixed.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. Is it not a fact that in fixing the rate of postage on newspapers by this bill we are fixing it for all time? It has been the uniform practice of the Government to diminish the rates of postage instead of increasing them, and if we once fix it at this rate it will never be placed at a higher rate, and moreover next year the gentleman from Connecticut or some one else will move to make the rate half a cent per pound and finally the postage on this matter will be abolished altogether.

Now a word more. It seems to me that the bill which passed the House, being reported from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, fixing the rate of postage at one and a half cents per pound on newspapers and on periodicals at three cents a pound, was the proper thing. It seems to me that if Congress intends to fix any rate of postage upon these publications it ought to fix the rate at something which will be a compensating rate. If not, wipe it out entirely. It cost $26,000,000 last year to transport the mails, and of that $26,000,000, $25,000,000 was the cost for the transportation of express matter and newspapers. We received in return for that something a little over a million dollars for an expenditure of $25,000,000. It seems to me that it would be the fair thing and the right thing either to impose a proper rate of postage or to wipe out this charge altogether and transport this matter through the mails free.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I hope the gentleman will put a mark of interrogation at the close of his remarks, for he interrupted me on the plea that he desired to ask a question.

The question was upon the amendment offered by Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS to the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I desire to state to the Chair that my amendment is an amendment to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations. The committee propose one cent and three mills and three cents as the rates. I propose one cent and two cents.

Mr. TYNER. If the Chair will bear with me I will state the proposition. The Senate proposes to make the rate four cents per pound; the Committee on Appropriations propose one and a half cents and three cents. The gentleman from New York proposes to fix it at one cent and two cents per pound.

The question was taken on the amendment offered by Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS, and it was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. TYNER. I propose to withdraw that part of the amendment of the committee which attaches to the proviso to the section. The amendment of the Senate will then be agreed to with an amendment, and the proviso will be open to such changes as the committee of conference may think necessary.

Mr. KASSON. I think it is necessary that there should be an amendment striking out the proviso so as to bring it within the purview of the committee of conference.

Mr. TYNER. I think not.

Mr. GARFIELD. O, no; the proviso is a part of the section.

Mr. KASSON. But you propose to concur in the proviso without any amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. The proviso is a part of the section. We have amended the section, and that leaves it to the conference committee to make any changes in it or in the proviso to it that they may deem fit.

Mr. KASSON. Very well.

The question was taken upon Mr. TYNER's motion; and the amendment of the Senate was concurred in with the amendments recommended by the Committee on Appropriations.

The next amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

That upon the receipt of such newspapers and periodical publications at the office of mailing they shall be weighed in bulk, and postage paid thereon by a special adhesive stamp, to be devised and furnished by the Postmaster-General, which shall be affixed to such matter, or to the sack containing the same, or upon a memorandum of such mailing, or otherwise, as the Postmaster-General may, from time to time, provide by regulation.

The Committee on Appropriations recommended concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

The newspapers, one copy to each actual subscriber residing within the county where the same are printed, in whole or in part, and published, shall go free through the mails; but the same shall not be delivered at letter-carrier offices or distributed by carriers unless postage is paid thereon as by law provided.

The Committee on Appropriations recommended concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

SEC. 8. That all mailable matter of the third class, referred to in section 133 of the act entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to the Post-Office Department," approved June 8, 1872, may weigh not exceeding four pounds for each package thereof, and postage shall be charged thereon at the rate of one cent for each two ounces or fraction thereof; but nothing herein contained shall be held to change or amend section 134 of said act.

The Committee on Appropriations recommended non-concurrence.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I understand that the committee recommend non-concurrence in that amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The committee do recommend non-concurrence.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I move to amend so as to concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has only to ask a division upon the question of concurring; that is the parliamentary form in which the question is put.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Before the vote is taken I desire the attention of the House to this section of the Senate amendment. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] referred to it in his remarks a few moments since. I replied to him very briefly. And I want the attention of the House called now to the fact that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] now proposes that third-class matter, in packages of the size of four pounds, shall not be allowed to go through the mails, although it may pay postage. And I want again to call the attention of the House to the fact that this class of matter, at the rate of postage proposed, will yield an absolute revenue to the Department sixfold greater than newspapers will yield.

I have in my district, and I see many gentlemen before me who I know have in their districts, men who live at a distance from express-offices and who cannot avail themselves of the express office, and to whom it would be a great convenience to receive packages of third-class matter through the mails. Then both as a matter of convenience to the masses of the people of the country and as a matter of revenue, which we need in the Post-Office Department, it is wrong to non-concur in this amendment of the Senate. Not only was this subject considered in the House the other day when a bill on the subject was passed, but the Senate adopts and accepts the proposition, and yet the Committee on Appropriations propose that it shall be rejected.

I stand here to say that it is not in the interest of the people nor of the Post-Office Department nor of anybody in the world except express companies that we should vote down this proposition. And if gentlemen want to make a record against the proposed amendment, that is their lookout and not mine. I only want the attention of members called to it so that they may realize what it is proposed they shall do when they are asked to non-concur in this amendment.

An act (H. R. No. 3174) explanatory of the act of June 30, 1864.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House resumed the consideration of the Senate amendments to the post-office appropriation bill.

The pending question was upon the following amendment of the Senate:

SEC. 8. That all mailable matter of the third class, referred to in section 133 of the act entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to the Post-Office Department," approved June 8, 1872, may weigh not exceeding four pounds for each package thereof, and postage shall be charged thereon at the rate of one cent for each two ounces or fraction thereof; but nothing herein contained shall be held to change or amend section 134 of said act.

The Committee on Appropriations recommended non-concurrence.

Mr. TYNER. I disagree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] in regard to the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations concerning this amendment. As the law now stands merchandise can be transmitted through the mails in parcels not exceeding twelve ounces in weight. Now in my judgment the purpose of a post is not to convey express matter through the mails all over the country. The object of the Post-Office Department is simply to convey intelligence to the people either in printed or written form. Whenever you go beyond that, and admit express matter, merchandise, or anything of that character in the mails, then you do it only as a matter of convenience to the people. I admit that there are some localities in the United States that are rather remote from express offices, and it seems to me that the Government should provide some mode by which they may receive packages of this sort. But when Congress authorized the transmission of packages of twelve ounces in weight through the mails it made as great a concession to the public interest, in my judgment, as it ought to do. If you now provide that these packages shall be conveyed in the mails to the extent of four pounds in weight, it will not be twelve months before the proposition will be made here to increase the weight of packages to six, eight, and ten pounds; and your post will become an express package-carrier, instead of a bearer of intelligence among the people.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Let me inquire if one result of such a proposition would not be that every railroad corporation now carrying the mails will claim to have their rates of compensation doubled and trebled?

Mr. TYNER. The law regulating the manner of compensating railroad companies for carrying the mails provides that they shall be paid according to weight. If you load your mails down with merchandise, as a matter of course when you come to readjust the compensation of railroad companies you must pay them for carrying merchandise as well as for carrying mail matter proper.

Mr. FORT. Mr. Speaker, I am not entirely certain that I understand what this amendment imports. I understand, however, that it would admit into the mails packages not exceeding four pounds in weight of any merchandise or thing that will not damage or interfere with the transmission of mail matter in the mail-bags. If that is the case, then I am in favor of the provision, not only because it is clearly in the interest of the people, but because it is also in the interest and profit of the Post-Office Department, this amendment should be adopted.

It will take any gentleman but a moment to figure up and see what profit the Government will make by carrying these packages in the mails for the convenience of the people. It is eight cents per pound, and, as I figure it, the Post-Office Department will receive $160 per ton for this kind of matter under this amendment. Am I not right? Then if the Government will receive $160 per ton for carrying these packages for the convenience of the people, the Post-Office Department will make a good profit, and it occurs to me that there is no great danger that the railroad companies can possibly so increase their rates for carrying the mails as to make the Government lose money in carrying these packages.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman speaks about the Government receiving $160 per ton for these packages. For what number of miles? The railroad companies receive so much per mile.

Mr. FORT. The postage to be paid on this matter will amount to $160 per ton for a long or short distance. If you put a ton weight of these packages in the post-office in New York to go one hundred miles the Government would get $160 for it. If I send it a thousand miles or to San Francisco the Government will receive the same sum, and it would well pay the Government for carrying these packages that distance.

Mr. GARFIELD. But we have to pay the railroads for carrying our mails; we pay them not only by the ton but by the mile.

Mr. FORT. Yes, sir; but the Government would make money on any distance. The Post-Office Committee understand no doubt how the contracts are made with the railroad companies to carry the mails. I understand those companies are paid so much per mile per pound; but I ask the gentleman who has charge of this bill [Mr. TYNER] whether the Government ever pays $160 a ton for carrying mail matter any distance in the United States; and, Mr. Speaker, whether these packages are not carried over from three to five hundred miles on the average?

Mr. TYNER. It does. Some of the railroad companies receive fifty dollars per mile for carrying two hundred pounds of mail matter per day. The gentleman, if he will figure that up, will find it amounts to about eight cents a pound. Undoubtedly it is the fact that the greater the quantity of matter passing over a road the less are the rates per pound.

Mr. FORT. Yes, but that is for carrying that amount every day in the year. The gentleman does not mean that it costs fifty dollars for carrying two hundred pounds one mile as he states it.

By examination of carefully prepared reports and papers of Mr. Bangs, superintendent of the railway mail service, who seems to clearly understand his official duties, it will appear that these packages can be carried for the people cheaply and at the same time the Government will make money by doing this service.

That is a question which the Post-Office Committee can settle. But in my judgment this is a provision in the interest of the people, and not in the interest of express companies. The people all over this broad country are interested in receiving at cheap rates small packages. They cannot afford to pay the heavy express charges. We all know that matter sent by express passes frequently through the hands of several express companies before reaching its destination, and thus the charges are increased. There would be nothing of the kind to increase the expense in the Post-Office Department. I trust the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, in two respects we are departing from the traditions of the post-office. I have already tried to point out one; I will now point out another. For the first fifty years of the postal service down to October 1, 1829, the total receipts for postage were $26,889,000 and the total expenditures on account of postage $25,246,400. In other words, for the first fifty years of the postal life of this country our Post-Office Department was not only self-sustaining, but paid a revenue of about one million and a half of dollars into the Treasury.

Now, I do not believe we ought to undertake to make the Post-Office Department a source of revenue, but I do think we should endeavor to make it self-sustaining. It ought to stand on its own ground. In view of the fact that during the first fifty years of this Government our total expenditure for postal service was but twenty-five millions and a quarter of dollars. I am amazed at the fact that we appropriate in this very bill $35,000,000 for the expenses of the Post-Office Department for a single year. In other words, for the next fiscal year the postal service of the country is to cost a total of $10,000,000 more than all our postal expenses during the first fifty years of the life of the Republic.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. But while we appropriate $35,000,000 for the postal service do we not expect to get $30,000,000 back?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. And do we not now send more mail matter through the mails in a single year than we did during the first fifty years of which the gentleman speaks?

Mr. GARFIELD. There is no doubt of that, and very much more. But I wish to call attention to still another fact. Two years ago for the first time in the history of the Government we departed from the time-honored doctrine that it was the business of the Post-Office Department to transmit intelligence for the information and improvement of the people. I affirm that our fathers, in establishing the Post-Office Department, had in view a sort of educational purpose, the diffusion of information among the people; not the carrying on of any ordinary commercial business.

Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York. Would the gentleman object to carrying Webster's Dictionary in the mails?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly not; for books are one of the mediums of intelligence. Letters, newspapers, books, all sorts of printed information are in the line of the original purpose of the post-office. But when you propose to carry on by means of the Post-Office Department a general express business for the benefit of the people, why should you not undertake to plant corn for the people? Is there not a limit somewhere to the extension of the functions of Government? Why should we go further than we have gone in this direction? I think we made a mistake in our departure two years ago from the original business of the Post-Office Department; but if you extend the innovation already made by allowing packages of dead weight of not more than four pounds to pass through the mails there is no reason why you should not include a whole car-load of wheat; there is no reason why you should not send pianos by mail; there is no reason why you should not undertake the entire transportation of merchandise for the people.

Mr. FORT. The Government could afford to do it at $160 a ton.

Mr. GARFIELD. I say that by such a measure as this we abandon the true policy of the post-office, and we assume under the cover of a postage-stamp jurisdiction of the general business of transportation.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. Would the gentleman have the mails transported on horseback, as they used to be in Franklin's time?

Mr. GARFIELD. O, no; not at all.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. Would the gentleman circumscribe the operations of any of the other Departments of the Government to what they were fifty years ago?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly not. I would carry out in all its breadth the policy of transmitting intelligence among the people. I would not object to including in the operations of the Post-Office Department the telegraph, if upon due consideration that measure shall seem advisable; for it is in the line of transmitting intelligence. But when you undertake to send through the mails mere dead weight, not intelligence, you transcend the fundamental idea in the establishment of a Post-Office Department.

Mr. FORT. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. MARSHALL. I renew the amendment by moving to strike out the last word. I seek the floor because I happen to be a member of the Committee on Appropriations and differ from the majority of that committee in their opinion of this question. I agree with my colleague [Mr. CANNON] who has spoken on this amendment that this adds nothing to the burdens of the Government. It does furnish, however, a great convenience, or will do so to a considerable portion of the people who need it. If it were a proposition to establish an express business generally where we have no lines whatever, I should oppose it as soon as any person on earth; but we have these mail routes and public carriers which are carrying the mails of the country for the people. There are many portions of the country, as has been well said by my colleague and others, which have not the convenience of express offices or express companies, and this provision would not impose any additional burden upon the Government whatever; for it has not been shown and it cannot be done that the cost of carrying these packages will be greater to the Government than the revenues derived from so doing. While it imposes no additional burden upon the Government it affords a great convenience to the people throughout the country. I see, therefore, no reason why we should non-concur in the action of the Senate. In my judgment the House should concur in the amendments of the Senate and furnish this additional convenience to the people. It is not and cannot be shown it will add one cent to the cost of carrying the mails. Indeed my friend here says it is an item of economy and we will derive additional revenue from it. I believe such will be the result.

As has been already remarked, I cannot see any interest in any person or parties in the country opposing this except it may be the express companies of the country. It may in a slight degree come in competition with their business, but only in a slight degree. I do not think it departs from the ordinary business of the country in carrying the mails; and I do not think we ought to vote it down when the other legislative branch of the Government has placed it on this bill, and it is now before the House for action. I shall vote to concur in the action of the Senate and against the recommendation of my colleagues on the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. COBURN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to oppose the amendment. I have been all along in favor of the greatest freedom in the transmission of mail matter. If I had the power I would make the transmission of mail matter entirely free. There is no reason why the Post-Office Department should support itself any more than the Army or Navy, or any more than the free schools. The object of the Post-Office Department, as the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. GARFIELD] has well said, is to transmit and diffuse intelligence throughout the country. That is understood to be its object, and that fact ought not to be forgotten. I will vote, therefore, to reduce newspaper postage and letter postage at every opportunity. The benefits of the Post-Office Department should have the widest possible range. But this matter now before the House is as wide as the world from any question of that kind. As long as we pay postage on anything, I am in favor of allowing postage on packages of this kind and in favor of carrying them. It is a matter of great convenience to all people remote from express offices, and while we do pretend to demand pay for anything why not take pay for packages of this kind? When the Government ceases to demand pay for any kind of mail matter it will be time to leave it off these packages, and not till then. Until that time arrives let us carry these packages and charge something on them, and let the people have the benefit of this Government express if they have a mind so to call it. Ours is a widely extended country, and there are some places too far separated from express offices to justify opposition to this measure. In many places the express offices are a considerable monopoly. The common people at remote distances will be largely benefited by this, and while we charge for any mail matter we ought to allow these packages to be increased to four pounds. I would not make the weight to be carried greater; but I believe there is no danger of carrying elephants or pianos, or any of those great weights which some dread. The fact is at the rate fixed in the bill no one can afford to pay to carry large or heavy articles. It is to be presumed subsequent Congresses will act rationally on this matter as an express, and I have no fear of launching into a dangerous experiment by allowing four pounds weight to be carried through the mails.

Mr. MARSHALL withdrew his pro forma amendment.

The question recurred on the amendment of the Senate.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 96, noes not counted.

So the amendment was concurred in.

The twelfth amendment of the Senate:

SEC. 9. That the Postmaster-General may prescribe, by regulation, an affidavit in form, to be taken by each publisher of any newspaper or periodical publication sent through the mails under the provisions of this act, or news agent who distributes any of such newspapers or periodical publications under the provisions of this act, or employé of such publisher or news agent, stating that he will not send, or knowingly permit to be sent, through the mails any copy or copies of such newspaper or periodical publications except to regular subscribers thereto, or news agents, without prepayment of the postage thereon at the rate of one cent for each two ounces or fractional part thereof; and if such publisher or news agent, or employé of such publisher or news agent, when required by the Postmaster General or any special agent of the Post-Office Department to make such affidavit, shall refuse so to do, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction, shall be fined not exceeding $1,000 for each refusal; and if any person shall knowingly and willfully mail any matter without the payment of postage as provided by this act, or procure the same to be done; or if any postmaster or post-office official shall knowingly permit any matter to be mailed without the prepayment of postage as provided in this act, and in violation of the provisions of the same, he or they shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be fined not less than $100 nor more than $1,000, or imprisoned not exceeding three years, one or both, in the discretion of the court.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The committee recommend concurrence.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I am not willing to vote for concurrence as this stands without some limitation.

I wish to call the attention of the committee to this point, that it may be corrected by the committee of conference. The amendment of the Senate provides—

That the Postmaster-General may prescribe, by regulation, on affidavit in form, to be taken by each publisher of any newspaper or periodical publication sent through the mails under the provisions of this act, or news agent who distributes any of such newspapers or periodical publications under the provisions of this act, or employé of such publisher or news agent, stating that he will not send, or knowingly permit to be sent, through the mails any copy or copies of such newspaper or periodical publications except to regular subscribers thereto, or news agents, without prepayment of the postage thereon at the rate of one cent for each two ounces or fractional part thereof; and if such publisher or news agent, or employé of such publisher or news agent, when required by the Postmaster-General or any special agent of the Post-Office Department to make such affidavit, shall refuse so to do—

That is to say, shall refuse to take an oath in advance that he will never mail such matter contrary to law—shall refuse to take an oath that he will not some time or other be a criminal for such refusal—he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction, shall be fined not exceeding $1,000 for each refusal.

Is that the way to get at it? The motive is to prevent publishers and their employés from putting matter into the mail contrary to law. That is what the framers of this amendment are thinking of. They are thinking of the great piles of papers that go from the larger newspaper offices by the cart-load to be mailed, and desire to prevent the employés, the people in the newspaper office, from throwing into the general pile transient papers addressed to persons not regular subscribers. Now there might be a few boys, three or four boys in the office, who might be disposed to put in such a bundle a paper addressed to some friend without a one-cent stamp on it, which would go to be weighed with the rest. Now under this amendment they desire to have an oath administered to the publisher and to all the employés that they will not put a single paper in illegally. If they decline to do it, and refuse to swear that they will not commit a crime, they are to be fined $1,000. The amendment goes on to provide:

And if any person shall knowingly and willfully mail any matter without the payment of postage as provided by this act—

That is to say, if a person puts a paper into the office not prepaid and if he knows anything about it, he knows it will not go unless prepaid—yet if he mails that paper, why then he may be fined $1,000 and be imprisoned for three years in the penitentiary. That I think certainly requires revision. But the words "as provided in this act and any violation of the provisions of the same," show that it was not this section alone that they were thinking of when they used this expression, but the section also providing for this express business and the sending all sorts of matter up to four pounds and the various other sections here.

Any violation of any of these provisions by any person subjects him it may be to $1,000 fine and three years' imprisonment, one or both. It strikes me that this punishing of men for not swearing that they will not commit a crime, and this extravagant punishment for a stupid or ignorant violation of a law that nobody now understands here entirely is something that is rather unusual and needs revision.

I wish that we may reach the object and prevent a violation of the law if we can. I would not object to some regulation which would prevent newspaper publishers from putting transient papers in the mails. If any newspaper office deliberately violates the law in this respect, I would not object to the Postmaster-General having the discretion to say "You shall not send your papers through the mail at all; me will stop them if you do not obey the law." But I do not like this provision as it stands now.

Mr. TYNER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] desires to offer an amendment, and I yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. KASSON. And the gentleman can then answer both the gentleman from Connecticut and myself. I wish to suggest some amendments to lines 18, 19, and 22 which seem to me necessary to make the thing legally accurate. The amendment reads thus:

If any person shall knowingly or willfully mail any matter without the payment of postage as provided by this act.

And in line 22 it is provided:

If any postmaster or post official shall knowingly permit any matter to be mailed without the prepayment of postage, &c.

It seems to me that the word "such" should be inserted as in all like cases, so that it may be limited to the persons referred to in section 9. My proposition is to make it read:

If any such person shall knowingly or willfully mail any matter without the payment of postage as provided by this act.

The early part of the section provides duties for publishers and their employés only, not the general public. I suppose the gentleman from Indiana will not object to this amendment.

Mr. TYNER. I think that is right.

Mr. KASSON. Then I also ask attention to the propriety of inserting in line 21, after the word "done," the words "and without intent of avoiding prepayment of the postage due thereon." I thought at first that these words might not be required, but on reflection I think they are necssary.

Mr. TYNER. I have no objection to that; and I think these amendments will very nearly meet the objection of the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY.] But the gentleman from Connecticut is not aware that the law as it now exists, and as it has existed for many years, requires that the publishers of newspapers shall when called upon make affidavit concerning the papers that they send out to actual subscribers. That law—I shall not take time in reading the whole of it—contains these words:

And if any such newspaper or other periodical shall be thus unlawfully sent with the knowledge or consent of such proprietor, or his agent, clerk, or servant in charge of such business, or if such affidavit shall when required by the Postmaster-General or any special agent of the Post-Office Department be refused, the person guilty of the offense or refusing to make the affidavit shall forfeit and pay fifty dollars in each case.

That is the same principle, but the amount of penalty is different.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. That is not an affidavit as to future conduct.

Mr. TYNER. The gentleman will see that under the present law, which provides for the collection of newspaper postage at the office of delivery instead of at the office of mailing, there is no necessity for requiring the affidavit that will be required when prepayment is demanded at the office of mailing.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. The gentleman is more familiar with the statutes than I am in relation to postal matters, and I desire to ask him if there is any provision on the statute-book requiring a publisher or his agent to make affidavit in advance that he will not violate the law?

Mr. TYNER. No, there is not. And for that reason I suggested that the publisher himself is not responsible for the postage that accrues upon his newspapers. But when under this law he becomes responsible he should be made to take an affidavit, in the first instance, that he will not knowingly commit a fraud.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. My objection to this amendment of the Senate is that it is a provision requiring the publisher of a newspaper and all his employés to take an oath that they never will violate the law, and if the publisher declines to take that oath, then he is to be punished by a fine of $1,000 and imprisonment. I think that is a very extraordinary provision.

Mr. TYNER. My proposition is this: That if a publisher avails himself of the use of the mails to send out his newspapers he shall be compelled to comply with the terms of the law, and if he cannot do it he should be excluded from the use of the mails.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The gentleman from Connecticut is in error. There is already a section in the postal code which substantially requires an affidavit like this. The only change proposed is to make the affidavit meet the proposed change in the law. I have the law before me, and from it it appears that the publisher has to take that affidavit now.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I desire to say a word upon this question. I hope the House will non-concur in the amendment. This oath required of publishers and their agents cannot be taken by any honest man with the expectation that it shall be literally fulfilled. It proposes that a man shall not only swear in advance that he will mail no matter that is not prepaid as the law requires that it shall be prepaid, but it makes him swear that he will mail no matter that is not fully prepaid. If he mails a paper, for instance, which is a fraction over two ounces, and fails to put on the right postage, he becomes liable to the extraordinary penalties provided in this act. Sir, there is no member of this House who can tell with certainty when he mails a newspaper what its exact weight is, and yet if the publisher puts into the post-office a newspaper without paying sufficient postage thereon, he is to be held liable to these penalties.

Mr. TYNER. When the gentleman from Virginia became a member of this House, he took an oath that he would not violate the Constitution of the United States. That oath referred to his future conduct. Why, then, is it wrong to require a newspaper publisher to swear that he will not violate the law?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Another objection to this section is that the punishment provided is entirely disproportionate to the offense. This bill provides that if any publisher shall mail any matter without the postage thereon being paid in full, he shall be fined as much as $1,000, and imprisoned for three years in the penitentiary. Even admitting that the man were guilty of the offense, I say that it is barbarous, cruel, and against the spirit of the age to put a man in the penitentiary for three years for mailing a newspaper without the proper postage on it. Even if he does it willfully, he knows that his paper will not go, and therefore he can have no intent to defraud the Government. And if he put it in without intent to defraud, he ought not to be fined and imprisoned to this extent. I hope the amendment offered by my friend from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] which was offered with my concurrence, will be adopted.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I desire to move an amendment which I think will meet the objections made to this section.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is an amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] pending.

Mr. KASSON. I understand that that amendment was accepted by the gentleman having charge of the bill.

Mr. TYNER. I have no right to accept an amendment; but I have no objection to that amendment.

The question was taken on Mr. KASSON'S amendment; and it was agreed to.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I move to amend the amendment of the Senate by inserting after the word "do," in line 16, the words:

And shall thereafter, without having taken such affidavit, deposit any newspaper in the mail for transmission.

It seems to me that although this section is perhaps not very important in its practical effect, it is in principle. It is open to the grave and serious objection that it requires a citizen to take an oath as to his future conduct.

The principle upon which this section of the postal code is based is this: the publisher of a newspaper is permitted to address his papers to his subscribers through the mails, and therefore he ought when availing himself of the privilege to be required to take oath that he will not attempt to defraud the Government. But as this section now stands the newspaper publisher may be required to make this affidavit even when he never has used and never wants to use the mails at all for the transmission of his newspapers. This provision requires every person to take this affidavit who may publish a newspaper, and on failure to do so to be liable to a penalty. My proposition is that if he fail to take the oath, and afterward undertakes to avail himself of the use of the mails for his papers, he shall be liable to the penalty.

Mr. TYNER. I do not know that I object to that amendment.

The amendment to the Senate amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. This section seems to be a dangerous one at the best. It gives to the Postmaster General certain powers. I presume it is not proposed to require this affidavit in all cases, but only where fraud is feared. I therefore move to amend by inserting after the words "Postmaster-General" the words "when in his judgment it shall be necessary;" so that if the Postmaster-Generall shall fear fraud in any particular case he may require such an affidavit.

The amendment to the Senate amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. I ask my friend from Indiana [Mr. TYNER] whether it is wise to leave the minimum of punishment as printed in this bill. The bill provides "not less than $100 nor more than $1,000." Is it not better to have it read "not more than $1,000?"

Mr. TYNER. I care nothing about that; I am indifferent to the matter.

Mr. KASSON. Then I move to strike out the words "less than $100 nor;" so that it will read "not more than $1,000."

The amendment to the Senate amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. I have one more amendment which I will suggest, but will not press against the views of the committee. It seems to me that three years' imprisonment is a very remarkable punishment for omitting to pay one cent postage on a newspaper. I suggest one year as the maximum instead of three years.

Mr. TYNER. The publishers ought not to complain, for if the punishment is extraordinarily severe, there will be no conviction under the law.

The amendment to the Senate amendment was agreed to; and the Senate amendment as amended was then adopted.

The next amendment of the Senate was to add to the bill the following:

SEC. 10. That so much of this act as changes the rate of postage on newspapers and periodical publications shall not take effect until the 1st day of January next.

The Committee on Appropriations recommend non-concurrence.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I trust this amendment will be concurred in. If there is to be change in the law as regards the rate of postage on newspapers we at least should have notice until January next.

Mr. GARFIELD. The committee thought there ought to be notice, but notice of more than is provided in this section. That is the reason they recommend non-concurrence in the amendment.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. With that understanding I will not object to non-concurring in the amendment.

The amendment of the Senate was non-concurred in.

The fourteenth amendment of the Senate was to add to the bill the following:

SEC. 11. That the sixty-third, eightieth, eighty-first, eighty-second, eighty-third, eighty-fourth, and eighty-sixth sections of the said "Act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to the Post-Office Department," approved June 8, 1872, be amended to read as follows:

SEC. 63. That the postmasters, except the postmaster at New York City, whose annual salary is hereby fixed at $8,000, shall be divided into four classes, as follows: The first class shall embrace all those whose annual salaries are not more than $4,000 nor less than $3,000; the second class shall embrace all those whose annual salaries are less than $3,000 but not less than $2,000; the third class shall embrace all those whose annual salaries are less than $2,000 but not less than $1,000; the fourth class shall embrace all postmasters whose annual compensation, exclusive of their commissions on the money-order business of their offices, amounts to less than $1,000.

SEC. 80. That the postmaster at New York City and postmasters of the first, second, and third classes shall be appointed and may be removed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall hold their offices for four years, unless sooner removed or suspended according to law; and postmasters of the fourth class shall be appointed and may be removed by the Postmaster-General, by whom all appointments and removals shall be notified to the Auditor for the Post-Office Department.

SEC. 81. That the compensation of the postmaster at New York City shall be $8,000 per annum, and the respective compensations of postmasters of the first, second, and third classes shall be annual salaries, assigned in even hundreds of dollars, and payable in quarterly payments, to be ascertained and fixed, by the Postmaster-General, from their respective quarterly returns to the Auditor for the Post-Office Department, or copies or duplicates thereof, for four quarters immediately preceding the adjustment or re-adjustment, by adding to the whole amount of box rents, not exceeding $2,000 per annum, commissions also not to exceed $2,000 per annum on the other postal revenues of the office, at the following rates, namely: On the first $100 per quarter 50 per cent.; on all over $100 and not over $400 per quarter, 40 per cent.; on all over $400 and not over $2,400 per quarter, 30 per cent.; and on all over $2,400 per quarter, 10 per cent. And in order to ascertain the amount of the postal receipts of each office, the Postmaster-General may require postmasters to furnish duplicates of their quarterly returns to the Auditor at such times and for such periods as he may deem necessary in each case: Provided, That whenever, by reason of the extension of free delivery of letters, the box rents of any post-office are decreased, the Postmaster-General may allow, out of the receipts of such office, a sum sufficient to maintain the salary thereof at the amount at which it had been fixed before the decrease in box rents.

SEC. 82. That the compensation of postmasters of the fourth class shall be the box rents collected at their offices and commissions on other postal revenues of their offices at the rate of 50 per cent. on the first $100 or less per quarter; 40 per cent. on the next $300 or less per quarter; 30 per cent. on the excess above $400 per quarter; the same to be ascertained and allowed by the Auditor in the settlement of the quarterly accounts of such postmasters: Provided, That when the aggregate annual compensation, exclusive of commissions on money-order business, of any postmaster of this class shall amount to $1,000, the Auditor shall report such fact to the Postmaster-General, in order that such postmaster may be assigned to his proper class, and his salary fixed as heretofore provided.

SEC. 83. That the salaries of postmasters of the first, second, and third classes, except that of the postmaster at New York City, shall be readjusted by the Postmaster-General once in two years, and in special cases as much oftener as he may deem expedient.

SEC. 84. That the Postmaster-General shall make all orders assigning or changing the salaries of postmasters in writing, and record them in his journal, and notify the change to the Auditor; and any change made in such salaries shall not take effect until the first day of the quarter next following such order: Provided, That in cases of not less than 50 per cent. increase or decrease in the business of any post-office, the Postmaster-General may adjust the salary of the postmaster at such office, to take effect from the first day of the quarter or period the returns for which form the basis of readjustment.

SEC. 86. That the Postmaster-General may designate offices at the intersection of mail routes as distributing or separating offices; and where any such office is of the third or fourth class he may make a reasonable allowance to the postmaster for the necessary cost of clerical services arising from such duties.

The Committee on Appropriations recommend non-concurrence.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I would like to inquire of the gentleman who has charge of this bill [Mr. TYNER] whether this amendment of the Senate will increase or decrease the salaries of postmasters? It was said by my colleague and friend from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] that the Post-Office Department ought to be self-sustaining. Now everybody knows that the Post-Office Department has ceased to be self-sustaining, mainly because the expenses have been very largely and very unnecessarily increased. The salaries of postmasters, except in the small offices, have been so largely increased that in most of our towns and villages of ordinary size their pay is much larger than the compensation given by private employers for services of a like character or value. And the pay for transporting the mails has been again and again increased until, notwithstanding the franking privilege has been abolished, expenses have gone on increasing so that the public has lost the whole benefit resulting from that fact, and the Post-Office Department is an annual charge upon the Treasury of the United States.

I think it is time we should begin to legislate in the interest of economy, and somewhat in the direction of a reduction of expenses. If we do not we may as well understand that this great upheaval of public sentiment among the people, sometimes called the "grange movement," will overtake gentlemen, and they will learn when too late that the republican party ought to do what they have not done as well as they might; that is, cut down expenses. The republican party has undoubtedly practiced an economy in public expenses which no other party has ever done or will do; but still there is room for improvement. Gentlemen on this floor may as well understand that retrenchment is demanded, and justly demanded, by the enlightened public judgment and by justice.

Mr. MAYNARD. I have taken but little part in this debate. But I desire to say that if my excellent friend from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] or any other gentleman in this House ever supposed that abolishing the franking privilege was going to reduce the expenses or increase the revenues of the Post-Office Department he was more verdant, if I may be allowed to use that expression, than I supposed him to be.

But I rise now principally for the purpose of entering, for I do not know how many times, a protest against the doctrine that the Post-Office Department should be self-sustaining. We can make the Post-Office Department self-sustaining if that is a desirable object in and of itself. In the first place, we can make our rates of postage sufficiently high; in the second place, we can pay our mail contractors little or nothing; and more especially and in the last place, we can refuse to put the mail service on any route when the business of the route will not pay for carrying the mails. Then your Post-Office Department will be self-sustaining. Restrict mail transportation to the more populous business portions of the country where you have expresses, where private corporations would carry the mails, but never go out into the prairies of the West, never go out into the mountains, never go out upon the frontiers with your mails, because if you do, your operations will be much more costly than in the more densely settled portions of the country.

We hear every session this talk about making the Post-Office Department self-sustaining, as though there were some virtue in that idea. Sir, I oppose making the Post-Office Department self-sustaining. It means the denial of postal facilities to those who have gone out upon the frontier to open up the wilderness; it means the denial of postal facilities to settlers in all sparsely populated parts of the country. It means the maintenance of mail facilities between New York and Philadelphia, between Baltimore and Chicago, and between others of our principal business cities. But when you get away from these points, if you carry out the idea of making the post-office self-sustaining, your mails will be monthly, perhaps bi-monthly.

I am in favor of affording facilities to our people for intercommunication of intelligence, for the circulation of newspapers, periodicals, and other forms of literature, even though the mail-carrier may go with scarcely a handful of matter. It is in this way that we diffuse intelligence to the borders of the land; it is in this way that we build up our civilization; not by your miserable, pitiful cry of "making your post-office self-sustaining."

Mr. TYNER. I move to amend by striking out the last word, for the purpose merely of saying to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] that in the amendments we are now considering there is no proposition to increase the salaries of the postmasters. The Committee on Appropriations has recommended non-concurrence only because there are in these amendments certain details that ought to be further examined.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to say that the views expressed by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] are such as would be very generally approved if the deficiency in the revenue of the Post-Office Department resulted from extending postal facilities to the sparsely-settled sections of the country. But all that can be done without having any deficiency. The deficiency in the revenues of that Department results from the large increase that has been made in the allowances to the great railroad corporations of the country, the increase during the last few years having been at the rate of more than 50 per cent., and upon such roads as the Erie Railroad of New York the increase within the last eighteen months has been over 100 per cent. It is by the controlling power exercised by these corporations over your Post-Office Department, increasing year after year the charges for transporting your mails, that this heavy deficit is produced.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I want to call attention to the fact that section 82 will necessarily diminish the pay of every little postmaster throughout the land. It seems to me the House ought to insist that the percentage on the first $100 or any fraction thereof should be 60 per cent. instead of 50.

The amendment of the Senate was non-concurred in.

The fifteenth amendment was read, as follows:

Insert the following:

SEC. 12. That section 240 of said act shall read as follows:

SEC. 240. That when the amount or mail-matter to be carried on any mail-route is so great as to seriously retard the progress or endanger the security of the letter-mail, or to increase the cost of carriage of the mail, the Postmaster-General shall provide for the separate carriage of the letter mail at the usual rate of speed; and when the cost of transmitting other mail-matter than the letter-mail is increased by being carried in postal cars, it shall be carried in other cars, but with due regard to expedition. And postal cars shall not be put on any routes, or the number be increased, except when the service of carrying the letter mail requires it.

The Committee on Appropriations recommended non-concurrence.

Mr. KASSON. I move to amend the amendment of the Senate by adding the following:

Provided, That no postmaster in any town or city having according to the last census a population less than fifty thousand in number, shall receive a higher compensation per annum than $3,000.

I have but a single word to say on this proposition. Early in this session I obtained from the Post-Office Department a statement of the effect which a measure of this kind would have upon the deficiency of the Department. I have only to say——

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to lose my right to make a point of order on this amendment.

Mr. KASSON. I submit that the point is made too late. I had commenced to debate the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair the point is made too late.

Mr. KASSON. I have found upon inquiry at the Post-Office Department that such an amendment as this would save several hundred thousand dollars annually.

Touching the merits of the amendment I wish to say that in most States of this Union, especially the agricultural States, there is no officer of the State government who is paid so high as the postmasters are paid in many of the towns of those States. The governor of Indiana does not receive as much salary as several postmasters in that State. In Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Iowa the secretary of state, the State auditor, the State treasurer, with a responsibility of from half a million to two or three million dollars, do not receive as much compensation as do your postmasters in many of the towns.

The question is one of justice. You do not pay the judges of your supreme courts in the agricultural States of this Union $4,000 a year; you do not pay your governors or other State officers that amount of salary; you do not even pay them $3,000. I say therefore that the postmaster of a single office, with limited responsibility, is in some cases paid by the General Government 50 per cent. higher than is received by State officers performing duties of the greatest responsibility.

In the interest of economy we should consider the question whether we are just in paying these high salaries to some postmasters while the great mass of postmasters throughout the country receive such small salaries. If you do not wish to save money, then take what you save this way justly and distribute it among postmasters whose pay is utterly insufficient for the service they do.

Mr. MAYNARD. Let me ask the gentleman a question. Concurring, as I do, in his estimate of the salaries paid, I wish to ask whether he thinks the population of a city or town is the proper criterion; whether the postal business does correspond in every instance with the population; whether the postal business in Chicago is not larger than in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, or in any other city than New York, and whether it is right to take the number of people in a place as the criterion for the compensation of a postmaster?

Mr. KASSON. It is the only criterion we can adopt for fixing the maximum rate.

Mr. KASSON's amendment was rejected.

The Senate amendment was non-concurred in.

The sixteenth amendment of the Senate:

Add the following:

SEC. 13. That section 245, section 246, section 247, section 251, and section 253 of the act entitled "An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to the Post-Office Department," approved June 8, 1872, be amended to read as follows:

SEC. 245. That every proposal for carrying the mail shall be accompanied by the bond of the bidder, with sureties approved by a postmaster, and in cases where the amount of the bond exceeds $5,000, by a postmaster of the first, second, or third class, in a sum to be designated by the Postmaster-General in the advertisement of each route; to which bond a condition shall be annexed, that if the said bidder shall, within such time after his bid is accepted as the Postmaster-General shall prescribe, enter into a contract with the United States of America, with good and sufficient sureties, to be approved by the Postmaster-General, to perform the service proposed in his said bid, and, further, that he shall perform the said service according to his contract, then the said obligation to be void, otherwise to be in full force and obligation in law; and in case of failure of any bidder to enter into such contract to perform the service, or, having executed a contract, in case of failure to perform the service, according to his contract, he and his sureties shall be liable for the amount of said bond as liquidated damages, to be recovered in an action of debt on the said bond. No proposal shall be considered unless it shall be accompanied by such bond, and there shall been affixed to said proposal the oath of the bidder, taken before an officer qualified to administer oaths, that he has the ability, pecuniarily, to fulfill his obligations, and that the bid is made in good faith, and with the intention to enter into contract and perform the service in case his bid is accepted.

SEC. 246. That before the bond of a bidder provided for in the aforesaid section is approved, there shall be indorsed thereon the oaths of the sureties therein, taken before an officer qualified to administer oaths, that they are owners of real estate, worth, in the aggregate, a sum double the amount of the said bond, over and above all debts due and owing by them, and all judgments, mortgages, and executions against them, after allowing all exemptions of every character whatever.

SEC. 247. That any postmaster who shall affix his signature to the approval of any bond of a bidder, or to the certificate of sufficiency of sureties in any contract before the said bond or contract is signed by the bidder or contractor and his sureties, or shall knowingly, or without the exercise of due diligence, approve any bond of a bidder with insufficient sureties, or shall knowingly make any false or fraudulent certificate, shall be forthwith dismissed from office, and be thereafter disqualified from holding the office of postmaster, and shall also be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both.

SEC. 251. That after any regular bidder whose bid has been accepted shall fail to enter into contract for the transportation of the mails according to his proposal, or, having entered into contract, shall fail to commence the performance of the service stipulated in his or their contract as therein provided, the Postmaster-General shall proceed to contract with the next lowest bidder for the same service, who will enter into a contract for the performance thereof unless the Postmaster-General shall consider such bid too high, in which case he shall readvertise such service. And if any bidder whose bid has been accepted, and who has entered into a contract to perform the service according to his proposal, and in pursuance of his contract has entered upon the performance of the service, to the satisfaction of the Postmaster-General, shall subsequently fail or refuse to perform the service according to his contract, the Postmaster-General shall proceed to contract with the next lowest bidder for such service, under the advertisement thereof, (unless the Postmaster-General shall consider such bid too high,) who will enter into contract and give bond, with sureties, to be approved by the Postmaster-General, for the faithful performance thereof, in the same penalty and with the same terms and conditions thereto annexed as were stated and contained in the bond which accompanied his bid; but in case each and every of the next lowest bidders for such service whose respective bids are not considered too high by the Postmaster-General shall refuse to enter into contract and give bond as herein required for the faithful performance of his contract, the Postmaster-General shall immediately advertise for proposals to perform the service on said route. Whenever an accepted bidder shall fail to enter into contract, or a contractor on any mail route shall fail or refuse to perform the service on said route according to his contract, or when a new route shall be established, or new service required, or when from any other cause there shall not be a contractor legally bound or required to perform such service, the Postmaster-General may make a temporary contract for carrying the mail on such route, without advertisement, for such period as may be necessary, not in any case exceeding six months, until a letting under advertisement can take place: Provided, however, That the Postmaster-General shall not employ temporary service on any route at a higher price than that paid to the contractor who shall have performed the service during the last preceding regular contract term. And in all cases of regular contracts hereafter made, the contract may, in the discretion of the Postmaster-General, be continued in force beyond its express terms for a period not exceeding six months, until a new contract with the same, or other contractors, shall be made by the Postmaster-General.

SEC. 253. That hereafter all bidders upon every mail route for the transportation of the mails upon the same, where the annual compensation for the service on such route at the time exceeds the sum of $5,000, shall accompany their bids with a certified check or draft, payable to the order of the Postmaster-General, upon some solvent national bank, which check or draft shall not be less that 5 per cent. on the amount of the annual pay on said route at the time such bid is made, and, in case of a new or modified service, not less than 5 per cent. of the amount of the bond of the bidder required to accompany his bid, if the amount of the said bond exceeds $5,000. In case any bidder, on being awarded any such contract, shall fail to execute the same, with good and sufficient sureties, according to the terms on which such bid was made and accepted, and enter upon the performance of the service to the satisfaction of the Postmaster-General, such bidder shall, in addition to his liability on his bond accompanying his bid, forfeit the amount so deposited to the United States, and the same shall forthwith be paid into the Treasury for the use of the Post-Office Department; but if such contract shall be duly executed and the service entered upon as aforesaid, such draft or check so deposited, and the checks or drafts deposited by all other bidders, on the same route, shall be returned to the respective bidders making such deposits. No proposals for the transportation of the mails where the amount of the bond required to accompany the same shall exceed $5,000 shall be considered, unless accompanied with the check or draft herein required, together with the bond required by a preceding section: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed or intended to affect any penalties or forfeitures which have heretofore accrued under the provisions of the sections hereby amended.

Mr. TYNER. I move to non-concur in all the remaining amendments of the Senate.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let that motion be confined to the particular section now pending.

Mr. TYNER. My proposition is to non-concur in the remaining amendments to the bill. The Committee on Appropriations recommend non-concurrence.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Is this motion debatable?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed with his five minutes.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I do not know what are the remaining amendments of the Senate, but I do not think we should non-concur without having them all read so we may understand them; and while we are on this subject I wish to say a single word in reply to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD.] He discussed one proposition and I discussed another. I do not object to carrying mail facilities just as far as the gentleman from Tennessee. I will go with him as far as any gentleman on this floor to carry mail facilities to every corner of the country, but in doing that I will not incur any unnecessary expense. And if it is a pitiful cry to insist there should be a reduction of the expenditures of the Government in this or any other

Department of the Government, I think the gentleman will find it is a cry to which the people will give their attention. It is high time there should be somebody stand up and speak in behalf of economy while there are so many to stand up and speak in favor of extravagance and unnecessary expenditures.

Mr. BURCHARD. I desire to move an amendment to the last section which provides that public documents may be sent through the mails without prepayment of postage. I think it is a good provision that postage should be paid on delivery.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope my colleague will limit his motion to suspend the rules and non-concur in the amendment of the Senate now pending.

Mr. TYNER. I adopt that suggestion and move to suspend the rules and non-concur in the pending amendment.

The question recurred on seconding the motion to suspend the rules.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 196, noes not counted.

So the motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

The rules were suspended, (two-thirds voting in favor thereof,) and the pending amendment was non-concurred in.

Seventeenth amendment of the Senate.

Add the following:

SEC. 14. That hereafter the requirement that postage shall be prepaid shall not apply to public documents certified to be such by any member of the Senate or of the House of Representatives, or by the President or head of any Executive Department, or other person entitled to the franking privilege when the law was passed abolishing the same; and the postage on no single volume of public document shall exceed the sum of twenty-five cents, and the same, if not prepaid, shall be payable by the person to whom the same may be directed and received; and the words "Public document," written or printed on the envelope containing any public document, and subscribed by the member or other person mailing the same, shall be deemed a sufficient certificate that the same is a public document; and the term public documents shall be deemed to include all publications printed by order of Congress, or either House thereof, or of any Department of the Government. And if any such documents shall not be taken from the post-office to which the same shall be directed within thirty days after being received thereat, the postmaster may sell the same for the amount of the postage due thereon, and shall account to the Post-Office Department for the proceeds thereof: Provided, That this section shall apply only to documents ordered to be printed by either House of Congress previous to the passage of this act: And provided further, That the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, or any part thereof, shall be carried through the mails free of postage.

Mr. TYNER. The committee recommend non-concurrence in this amendment.

Mr. BURCHARD. I desire to move to strike out all in this section preceding line 7 and all following the word "thereof" in line 22.

This will leave merely the proposition to which I referred a moment or two ago to stand by itself, that public documents may circulate through the mails without prepayment of postage, the postage being left to be paid on their delivery.

I move to strike out the first six lines, because they may be construed into a restoration of the franking privilege. I also move to strike out so much of the section as limits the provision to documents already printed, and also so much as provides that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD or any part thereof shall be carried through the mails free of postage. I hope the House will concur in the remainder of the section.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. WHEELER.) The gentlemen will send his amendment to the Clerk in writing.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. Does not a motion to concur take precedence of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion to amend takes precedence.

Mr. MILLS. I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] has been received at the desk, and will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the first six lines of the section, and strike out all after the word "thereof" in line 22.

Mr. MILLS. I offer the following amendment:

In line 8 of the section strike out "twenty-five" and insert "ten;" so it will read:

The postage on no single volume of public document shall exceed the sum of ten cents.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I hope the attention of the House will be given to this section. There can be no doubt that it is to a very considerable extent a restoration of the franking privilege. As such I object to it, and I desire a distinct vote taken upon the question, and if possible by yeas and nays.

Now, I am not going to join in any common cant or slang about the franking privilege. It was abused no doubt to some extent. Still it had its uses. It certainly had its benefits at a time when our facilities for the distribution of information were not so good as they are at present. It was then valuable to the people, and valuable to our public institutions, if not abused. But the public sentiment of the country was upon the whole against it. The tendency of public sentiment has been in the direction of paying for everything we send through the mails. The public adopted that idea and we legislated in that direction a year ago. We have professed to abolish the franking privilege. We have professed a sincere desire to make the experiment of no free matter. I wish to adhere to that experiment for one or two or three or four years until we understand and the country understands its operation. Perhaps by and by public sentiment may justify some modification of the existing law by which public documents got up at the public expense may be distributed.

Mr. FORT. I wish to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. No, sir. But we are evidently not ready for that yet. Public sentiment is not ready for it. And so I object to any direct or indirect restoration of the franking privilege of any sort or description whatever. I wish to wait one or two or three years longer, and then see what should be done. For the present I am unalterably opposed to that, and I call for the yeas and nays.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the bill (H. R. No. 1572) to amend the several acts providing a national currency, and to establish free banking, and for other purposes.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House resumed the consideration of the Senate amendments to the post-office appropriation bill.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. With regard to what the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] has said, I desire to say that this is no restoration of the franking privilege. This does not permit documents to go through the mails free of postage. The gentleman from Connecticut asserts that the people of this country have petitioned Congress that the franking privilege be repealed. Well, sir, I do not believe that the people of this country ever did any such thing. The Postmaster-General of the United States, after having almost a cord of petitions printed in the Government Printing Office at the Government's expense, sent these petitions out to the different postmasters in the country, who in many cases filled them up with their own hands, as they feared their official heads would be cut off unless they would indorse this humbug, because it is nothing else. They did in some cases get a few people to sign these petitions, but in the majority of cases they signed them themselves with the names of persons taken from the directories of the different towns and cities of the country. They went to the tombstones and to the graveyards in many cases to get the names of men and send them up here to instruct the American Congress upon this question.

Now, sir, if it be true that the people did petition us to repeal this franking privilege, why let them know the full effect of it by paying the postage themselves upon all documents that they may desire. For one member of this Congress, after the people of this country have demanded that our pay shall be so reduced that no man can live conveniently here as a member of Congress upon it, I do not propose to pay any postage upon these documents.

Now this section simply proposes that the people who petitioned for a redress of this grievance shall pay their own postage. Let them do it if they desire the documents.

Mr. FORT. How can the dead men do it?

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. My friend asks how the dead men can do it. Members of Congress do not send documents to dead men, but the postmasters put the names of dead men upon petitions to Congress asking the repeal of the franking privilege.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is very clear that no man has asked for the restoration of the franking privilege since its abolition; that is very clear.

Mr. TYNER. Mr. Speaker, I am quite willing to let my vote, in the event the yeas and nays shall be called on this amendment, indicate to my constituents what my position is in regard to it. But I do want to say that I am ready to put myself on record in any manner whatever against anything which looks like a restoration of the franking privilege.

Sir, I voted for the repeal of the franking privilege during the last Congress. I have had no report from the Post-Office Department since nor any other information that indicates to me that I ought to change my position in that regard. I believe, sir, that I was as much instructed by my constituents, through their platforms at home, through the expressions of the public press and in every other way, to vote in favor of the repeal of the franking privilege and against its restoration, as I have ever been instructed in regard to any question.

We are now entering upon a political campaign in which some gentlemen of this House are to take a part, and in which they are to be candidates. I warn them that they had better be cautious about voting for anything that looks like a restoration of the franking privilege. I have little more to say and then I desire to yield the remainder of my time to my friend from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD;] but I want to say, in addition, that this proposition is to permit the postage on these documents to be collected at the office of delivery. It means that any constituent of any gentleman on this floor shall be privileged to ask him to send him a report, but it is to be at the expense of the constituent, and with the understanding that he himself shall pay the postage. I now yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say a single word only upon this amendment, and then I hope the previous question will be sustained and a vote will be taken. There is a proviso at the end of this section that hereafter the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD shall pass through the mails free, and in that there is this a little bit of moral bribery offered to every member of Congress, that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD or any part thereof shall pass through the mails free of postage.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. The appendices.

Mr. GARFIELD. All you would have to do is to have your speeches printed with a heading "Appendix to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD," and it becomes a part of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and passes free through the mails. In other words, here is a plan to let all the speeches that members of Congress may make, if they have a simple heading saying something about the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, go through the mails free hereafter, and if that is not a species of moral bribery, which I believe this House will not have the courage or rather the lack of it to consent to, then I do not know what is bribery. I ask for the previous question, and call for the yeas and nays in concurring in the amendment of the Senate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires to ask the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] upon which of these propositions he asks for the yeas and nays. There are two amendments to the amendment of the Senate which have been offered in the House. Does he desire the yeas and nays upon those amendments, or upon concurring in the Senate amendment?

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the yeas and nays will be called on the question of concurrence in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The first amendment pending is that offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] to strike out in line 8 of the Senate amendment the words "twenty-five" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "ten;" so that it will read, "and the postage on no single volume of public document shall exceed the sum of ten cents, &c."

Mr. MARSHALL. I desire to say a few words on this amendment.

Mr. SHANKS. I have been trying to get the floor myself, and I must object.

Mr. TYNER. The previous question has been asked by my colleague, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered being first upon the amendment offered by Mr. MILLS.

The question was put; and on a division there were, ayes 115, noes not counted.

Mr. GARFIELD. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, 34 members voting therefor.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 127, nays 111, not voting 51; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albert, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Begole, Bell, Berry, Bland, Bowen, Bright, Brown, Buckner, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Benjamin F. So the amendment of Mr. MILLS was agreed to.

The question recurred upon the motion of Mr. BURCHARD to strike out of the amendment of the Senate the following at the beginning of the section:

That hereafter the requirement that postage shall be prepaid shall not apply to public documents certified to be such by any member of the Senate or of the House of Representatives, or by the President or head of any Executive Department, or other person entitled to the franking privilege when the law was passed abolishing the same; and.

Also to strike out the following at the end of the section:

Provided, That this section shall apply only to documents ordered to be printed by either House of Congress previous to the passage of this act: And provided further, That the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, or any part thereof, shall be carried through the mails free of postage.

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. BURCHARD; and upon a division there were—ayes 75, noes 15; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BURCHARD and Mr. SPEER were appointed.

Mr. SPEER. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Is this amendment divisible?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. SPEER. Is it in order to move to amend the amendment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not; for the previous question is operating.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were ayes 83, noes not counted.

Mr. SPEER. I think the House has been voting under a misapprehension of the question, and I therefore call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires to state that the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] having been offered as an amendment to the one offered by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BURCHARD,] if the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois be voted down the amendment of the gentleman from Texas will fall also.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The amendment of the gentleman from Texas relates to a portion of the section not affected by that of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BURCHARD. As I understood, the amendment of the gentleman from Texas was submitted as an independent proposition, and so voted on.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair at the time stated distinctly that the amendment of the gentleman from Texas must be germane to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MILLS. Does the Chair state that if the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois is voted down my amendment goes down?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. MILLS. Then if the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois is voted up my amendment goes down also.

The SPEAKER. That is a question for the House to determine, not the Chair.

Mr. WOODFORD. Desiring to vote for a part and against a part of this amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, is it not proper to ask that it be divided?

The SPEAKER. It can be divided if it contains distinct substantive propositions.

Mr. CESSNA. There is some confusion about the statement of the Chair in my mind, for he seems to connect the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] with the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BURCHARD.] Now the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois relates to a part of the section not reached by the amendment of the gentleman from Texas. The amendment of the gentleman from Texas has been adopted, and is now a part of the section. I differ with the Chair with great reluctance; but it seems to me that the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois contains three distinct propositions, and if so I shall ask for a separate vote on each one of them. The first proposition is to strike out the first six lines of the amendment of the Senate as printed. That is a separate, distinct, and substantive proposition of itself. The second proposition is to strike out the first proviso of the section, which is also a separate and independent proposition of itself. The third proposition is to strike out the last proviso of the section, which is also a separate and independent proposition of itself. The three parts of the amendment are not related to each other; they are different in character; and in order that the House may have an opportunity to vote according to its own desire I shall ask the Chair to allow the amendment to be divided into the three parts I have indicated.

Mr. HOSKINS. A single word in regard to the proposition now before the House. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] moved an amendment to a certain portion of this section, and his amendment was adopted by the House. I submit that the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] and that proposed by the gentleman from Texas are not germane to each other; they do not apply to the same portion of the section nor to the same subject. It strikes me therefore, with due deference of course to the ruling of the Chair, that they are independent propositions, and that if the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois be voted down it does not necessarily carry with it the amendment of the gentleman from Texas, for the reason that the two amendments do not apply to the same subject-matter or the same part of the section.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not hold himself responsible if the House has been misled upon this proposition. He distinctly stated to the gentleman from Texas, and it is so recorded, that his amendment must be germane and must appertain to that of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BURCHARD.] The mistake, if there has been any, was on the part of the House, not of the Chair. In view of the circumstances under which the amendment of the gentleman from Texas was offered, the Chair now states that if the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois be voted down, that of the gentleman from Texas goes down with it. If the House has acted under any misunderstanding that may be corrected; but the Chair is corroborated in his position by the Journal clerk who made the entry.

Before deciding the question whether the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois is divisible, the Chair asks that gentleman to state his amendment, so that it may be understood whether it embraces different substantive propositions.

Mr. BURCHARD. I moved to strike out the first six lines of the section down to and including the word "and;" so that the section should begin, "The postage on no single volume," &c. I also moved to strike out after the word "thereof" in line 22, the proviso and the further proviso, leaving the body of the section to which the gentleman from Texas had moved his amendment striking out twenty-five and inserting ten.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair holds that this amendment is divisible.

Mr. MILLS. I move to reconsider the vote by which my amendment was adopted, so that the House may extricate itself from this difficulty. Either this must be done, or my amendment must be considered as an independent proposition. The Chair has correctly stated that he put to me the question whether my amendment was germane to that of the gentleman from Illinois. I do not wish the Chair to be placed in a wrong attitude before the House. My amendment relates to the very next sentence after the first part of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, and I thought it was germane to that amendment. But I see now that it is not so, and therefore I presume my amendment must be adopted as an independent proposition.

Mr. PARSONS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I wish to know whether the House cannot now vote directly to strike out the first six lines and the last six lines of this section without affecting at all the independent proposition embraced in the middle of the section?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will entertain the proposition of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] to reconsider the vote by which his amendment was adopted.

Mr. BURCHARD. I rise to a point of order. As the order for the previous question was partly executed, I submit that it is not in order to reconsider.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That point of order is well taken. The question will now be taken upon the first proposition of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, which is to strike out the first six lines of the section. The clause proposed to be struck out will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That hereafter the requirement that postage shall be prepaid shall not apply to public documents certified to be such by any member of the Senate or of the House of Representatives, or by the President or head of any Executive Department, or other person entitled to the franking privilege when the law was passed abolishing the same; and.

The question being taken, there were ayes 45, noes not counted.

Mr. TYNER. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CLYMER. I move that the House take a recess till half past seven o'clock.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is necessary that this bill should be sent to a conference committee to-night, if we are to adjourn on the 22d.

The motion of Mr. CLYMER was not agreed to; there being—ayes 72, noes 98.

The question recurring on ordering the yeas and nays upon agreeing to the first division of the amendment of Mr. BURCHARD, the yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the first division of the amendment was not agreed to.

The question then recurred upon the second division of the amendment, which was to strike out the following:

Provided, That this section shall apply only to documents ordered to be printed by either House of Congress previous to the passage of this act.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 100, noes 48.

So the second division of the amendment was agreed to.

The question then recurred on the third division of the amendment, which was to strike out the following:

And provided further, That the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, or any part thereof, shall be carried through the mails free of postage.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. The House having refused to strike out the first part of the section, as proposed by the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, if these words should now be struck out where then would be the amendment of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. CESSNA. That relates to the middle of the section.

The question being taken; there were—ayes 78, noes 71.

Mr. SPEER called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SPEER and Mr. BURCHARD were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 107, noes 63.

So the third division of the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will now state that the portion of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois to which the gentleman from Texas offered his amendment has been adopted; consequently the amendment of the gentleman from Texas has been adopted. But the Chair will rule that the latter was offered as an independent amendment, and the entry in the Journal will be made accordingly.

The question recurring on concurring in the amendment of the Senate, as amended,

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BURCHARD. I ask that the Senate amendment as now amended be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 14. That hereafter the requirement that postage shall be prepaid shall not apply to public documents certified to be such by any member of the Senate or of the House of Representatives, or by the President or head of any Executive Department, or other person entitled to the franking privilege when the law was passed abolishing the same; and the postage on no single volume of public document shall exceed the sum of ten cents, and the same, if not prepaid, shall be payable by the person to whom the same may be directed and received; and the words "public document" written or printed on the envelope containing any public document, and subscribed by the member or other person mailing the same, shall be deemed a sufficient certificate that the same is a public document; and the term public documents shall be deemed to include all publications printed by order of Congress, or either House thereof, or of any Department of the Government. And if any such documents shall not be taken from the post-office to which the same shall be directed within thirty days after being received thereat, the postmaster may sell the same for the amount of the postage due thereon, and shall account to the Post-Office Department for the proceeds thereof.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I move that the House now take a recess.

The motion was not ageed to.

The question recurred on concurring in the Senate amendment as amended.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 113, nays 119, not voting 57; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albert, Albright, Arthur, Ashe, Barber, Barnum, Barrere, Barry, Beck, Begole, Bell, Berry, Biery, Bowen, Bradley, Bright, Brown, Buckner, Burchard, Burleigh, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Caldwell, Cannon, Cason, John B. Clark, jr., Freeman Clarke, Clymer, Stephen A. CHOCTAW CLAIM.

Mr. WARD, of New Jersey, obtained the floor, and yielded ten minutes to

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri, who said: Mr. Speaker, I would not trouble the House at this time if it were not for the fact that in the discussion the other day on what was called the Choctaw claim the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBURN,] unwittingly, of course, fell into a blunder which may justly be considered as putting members of Congress in the position of having voted for a claim for which a receipt in full had already been given. In order that those gentlemen who voted for the bill and in order that those who discussed it and voted against it may not be put in a false position, I desire the facts in connection with this matter may be given to the country so they may be completely understood.

It will be remembered that the gentleman from Indiana had read a receipt which he claimed in his speech was a receipt in full for the payment of this Choctaw claim. Of course if that be the fact then this House was spending valuable time in discussing a claim which had been receipted for in full and it puts the House in a false position. If it be true that this claim had been satisfied in full and a receipt had been given for it, it also puts a leading committee of this House, the Committee on Appropriations, in a false position.

If it be true that a receipt in full had been given for this claim, it puts the gentleman from Maine, the gentleman from Ohio, my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SPEER,] and in fact all of the gentlemen who discussed this, except the gentleman from Indiana himself, in a singular position, because they all admitted that the claim had merits in it. It could not have any merits in it if a receipt had been given in full for it.

In order that the facts may be known in connection with this matter, I desire to trespass upon the House briefly to show what this receipt means and what it was given for, and that it may be perfectly understood I ask the Clerk to read the receipt as given in the RECORD and that portion of the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana immediately following.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Copy of release referred to in the foregoing letter.]

Whereas by an act of Congress entitled "An act to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1852," it is provided that after the 30th day of June, 1852, all payments of interest on the amounts awarded Choctaw claimants, under the fourteenth article of the treaty of Dancing Rabbit Creek, for lands on which they resided, but which it is impossible to give them, shall cease, and that the Secretary of the Interior be directed to pay said claimants the amount of principal awarded in each case respectively, and that the amount necessary for this purpose be appropriated, not exceeding $872,000; and that the final payment and satisfaction of said award shall be first ratified and approved as a final release of all claims of such parties under the fourteenth article of said treaty by the proper national authority of the Choctaws, in such form as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior: Now, be it known, that the said general council of the Choctaw Nation do hereby ratify and approve the final payment and satisfaction of said awards, agreeably to the provisions of the act aforesaid, as a final release of all claims of such parties under the fourteenth article of said treaty.

Mr. COBURN. Under the release I have just read $850,000 was paid by the Government and accepted by the authorities of the Choctaw Nation as a complete and final settlement. There the matter should rest. If the account has since been opened, if an equity has been raised on behalf of these Indians, if an obligation has since been incurred by the treaty-making power of the United States, that is matter of discussion for lawyers; it is a question that ought to be investigated thoroughly and completely, and should not be brought in here at the end of an appropriation bill to be discussed under the present circumstances.

I regard this matter as of very great importance aside from the amount of money involved. We ought to adopt and stand by a policy against opening claims of such great age unless some equity of a very strong character is presented.

Here, so far as I can see, there is none. The claim seems to be trumped up after settlement in full more than twenty years. It deserves the fullest investigation and the most thorough discussion, such as we cannot give at this time.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. It will be observed, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman asserts in his remarks here that this receipt was given in full, and he uses the expression that if this account is again to be opened there should be some strong equity before it is opened. Why, sir, it never has been closed. The gentleman fell into a most egregious blunder when he presumed that this receipt was given in full for this claim that has been before the House at this session. It will be remembered by the House that after the Senate made its award in 1859 it directed the Secretary of the Interior to make up the account, and in that account is shown just exactly what this receipt was given for.

The whole number of acres of land the Government acquired of these people by purchase was 10,423,195.69 acres. It will be remembered that under the treaty of 28th September, 1830, called the treaty of Dancing Rabbit Creek, a portion of those people desired to remain in their country in Mississippi. The Government by the fourteenth article of that treaty provided that those who desired to remain should have set apart to them a reservation of six hundred and forty acres to the head of each family and so much to each child and member of such family. The amount of these reservations that were set apart under this fourteenth article of the treaty was in the aggregate 334,101.62 acres. It was ascertained when the Government, after having made a survey of this country, came to parcel out these reservations to these people that settlers had gone upon the land, and the Government of the United States was unable to comply with the provisions of the treaty of 1830. The lands were not there to be given to them.

In order to settle the controversy Congress passed a law in 1842 providing for the appointment of commissioners to settle the differences between them. Those commissioners did settle the differences, and the Government by its solemn treaty, subsequently entered into, provided that this people should have, in lieu of the reservations, scrip valued at $1.25 per acre and upon which scrip they were to pay interest at the rate of 5 per cent. until the principal was satisfied. Under the terms of the act of June 30, 1852, the Government appropriated $872,000 to satisfy this scrip which had been given in lieu of the reservations belonging to the Choctaws who chose to remain in the State of Mississippi. This receipt, when the $870,000 were paid, wa given in full satisfaction of the claim for these 322,046.74 acres, or the scrip for it; and that is all that this receipt means and all that it has reference to.

By turning to the fourteenth article of the treaty of 1830, it will be observed that that article, which is referred to in this receipt as being the one out of which the subject-matter of the receipt grew, has no reference to anything in the world except these 334,000 acres of reservations. Article 14 of the treaty provides that—

Each Choctaw head of a family being desirous to remain and become a citizen of the States shall be permitted to do so by signifying his intention to the agent within six months from the ratification of this treaty, and he or she shall thereupon be entitled to a reservation of one section of six hundred and forty acres of land, to be bounded by sectional lines of survey; in like manner shall be entitled to one-half that quantity for each unmarried child which is living with him over ten years of age, and a quarter section to such child as may be under ten years of age, to adjoin the location of the parent. If they reside upon said lands intending to become citizens of the States for five years after the ratification of this treaty, in that case a grant in fee-simple shall issue; said reservation shall include the present improvement of the head of the family, or a portion of it. Persons who claim under this article shall not lose the privilege of a Choctaw citizen, but if they ever remove are not to be entitled to any portion of the Choctaw annuity.

It will be observed that when the Secretary of the Interior cast up this amount in 1859 he deducted from the account the three hundred and thirty-four thousand acres for which we had given the scrip, and upon that subsequently paid this $870,000. This receipt, by its express terms, is a receipt in full only for the value of three hundred and thirty-four thousand acres of land, nothing further. It expresses upon its face that that is what it is.

Now, without being desirous of criticising the gentleman from Indiana, I will say that he either knew about this matter or he did not know. If he did not know about it, then it was certainly, to say the least and to put it in the mildest form possible, unkind for him to seek to put almost one-half of this House in the position before the country and the world of voting to pass here a claim which, if it had been as he asserted, satisfied, it would have been simply an outrage upon the House to undertake to pass. If he did not understand the case, if he fell into this error without understanding it, he is equally culpable as though he had understood it, because upon a matter of this importance and magnitude which may affect the standing of fellow-members of this House, which may put them in a false position before their associates, it is ungenerous for a gentleman of this House to make assertions upon a subject about which he knows nothing. If he does know anything about it, then he does not properly understand and construe the record.

I beg pardon of the House and of the Chair for thus trespassing upon their attention on this matter; but I deemed it due to other gentlemen of this House, as well as to myself, that the country should properly understand what this receipt was, and that the speech of the gentleman, consisting of assertions that this was a fraudulent and trumped-up claim, should not go to the country without the facts being shown to rebut such statements. I thank the House for its attention.

BOUNTIES.

Mr. WARD, of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I had the honor to introduce, in the early part of the session, a bill (H. R. No. 1244) granting bounties to the heirs of deceased soldiers. I give notice that I will, on the first opportunity, call up that measure and press it to a vote. I send it to the Clerk's desk that it may be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill granting bounties to heirs of soldiers who enlisted in the service of the United States during the war for the suppression of the rebellion for a less period than one year, and who were killed or have died by reason of such service.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the heirs of any soldier who was killed or died while in the military service of the United States, in the line of duty, during the war for the suppression of the rebellion, whose period of enlistment was for less than one year, or who shall have since died by reason of wounds received or disease contracted while in such service, shall be entitled to receive the same bounties as if said soldier had enlisted for three years: Provided, That the heirs so entitled shall be such, and only such, as are named and in the order named, and upon the conditions mentioned in the first section of the act of July 11, 1862: And provided further, That nothing in this act shall authorize the payment on account of any soldier who has received bounty from the Government of the United States.

Mr. WARD, of New Jersey. The object and purpose of this measure is clearly and concisely stated in the bill. It provides that the heirs of those who were killed or who have died from wounds or disease contracted in the rebellion, whose periods of enlistment were for less than one year, shall be entitled to receive the same bounties as if they had enlisted for three years; and also provides that nothing shall be paid on account of any soldier who has received bounty.

Volunteers in the Army of the United States who served in the recent war, and who enlisted for one year and upward, have very properly received bounties, while those who came forward so promptly and nobly in the beginning of the struggle, have been in this respect wholly neglected. It has always seemed to me manifestly unjust that those who were first to respond to the President's proclamation calling upon the militia of the several States to aid in maintaining "the honor, the integrity, and the existence of our National Union," should be treated with less consideration by the General Government than those who subsequently enlisted.

The bill under consideration does not propose to give bounties to those who survive, though it would be only equal justice that they should receive them, but it proposes that where any one of these soldiers has laid down his life on the field of battle or has died by reason of wounds received or disease contracted in the service, that then his widow, his mother, his children, his sisters, or brothers, according to the established order of representation as proposed in the bill, shall receive a bounty equal to that received by those who enlisted for a longer period.

In order that the proviso of this bill may be properly understood, I call attention to the following extract from the act of July 11, 1862, specifying the beneficiaries under that act:

Provided, That said bounty shall be paid to the following persons, and in the order following, and to no other person, to wit: First, to the widow of such deceased soldier, if there be one; second, if there be no widow, then to the children of such deceased soldier, share and share alike; third, if such soldier left neither a widow, or child, or children, then and in that case such bounty shall be paid to the following persons, provided they be residents of the United States, to wit: First, to his father; or, if he shall not be living or has abandoned the support of his family, then to the mother of such soldier; and if there be neither father nor mother as aforesaid, then such bounty shall be paid to the brothers and sisters of the deceased soldier, resident as aforesaid.

Mr. Speaker, this proposition needs no argument; neither logic nor rhetoric can aid it. Whether the soldier enlisted for three months or three years, or for a shorter or longer period, I think it will be admitted by all that if he gave his life to his country he gave as much as he who gave most—even all that he had; and his dependent family is equally deprived of the services and support of their natural protector.

We are to-day in the full enjoyment of home and country, of civil and religious liberty, of freedom and equality. We have privileges that no other people on earth enjoy. These privileges have cost a price, and that price is the blood of those whom this bill seeks to remember. Our sense of obligation and gratitude cannot reach them, but those who were ever dearer to the dying soldier than his waning life are within our reach, and it is but a small meed of justice for us to say to them we will pay to you who have lost your son, or husband, or brother, that which they did not receive in life, and which the thousands of volunteers now in life and health did receive.

The proposed bounty is in fact only about one-half the sum realized by those who were entitled to bounties under existing laws, because they received their bounties long years ago, which, with the interest added, reaches nearly twice the sum originally paid them. It is only asked at this period for the representatives of those soldiers who enlisted for less than a year, and have died by reason of their services, what others received many years since.

I know that retrenchment and economy is the aim of the members of this House, and rightly too, and no one will by any proper measure go further in that direction than I; but let us see to it that in our endeavor to promote economy we do not perpetuate injustice, and that we are not sordid and ungrateful, remembering that there are some duties to which the plea of economy cannot rightfully be made. While the volunteers for a year and upward have received their bounties and many are now enjoying them, we cannot under the plea of economy refuse a bounty to the widows and mothers of those against whom the Government has so long and unfairly discriminated.

But, Mr. Speaker, it appears to me that considered as a measure of economy even, this bill should be approved. This nation is in its infancy, and it is too much to hope, with all our desires for peace, that there are not other wars before it, and more blood to be shed, and I insist therefore that the Government cannot afford to withhold this justice, and longer manifest a want of consideration for those who have died in defense of the nation; for such a policy would tend to retard enlistments and lead the people in times of emergency to stand aloof from the defense of the national life until the necessities of the Government would compel the offering of extraordinary bounties. Whether, therefore, considered as an act of justice, or in view of possible future wars, I deem this measure to be equally entitled to our favorable action.

Mr. Speaker, those whom the bounties provided by this act would reach, being the families of deceased soldiers, are the ones who have suffered most by the war. Deprived of the care and support of those upon whom they depended, they were obliged alone to toil and to suffer, and often for the very necessaries of life. They bore the anxieties and tortures of mind incident to the ever-pressing reflection that son or husband or brother was in peril. Theirs was the grief and fearful desolation when were returned to the family circle, cold and dead, the remains of him who a few months before left them bouyant with hope and burning with patriotism; theirs have since been the privations and neglect incident to a life of poverty and want.

Since the beginning of the war up to the present time it has been my pleasure to give some attention to the interests of the soldiers and of those they have left behind them; and while as a rule they bear their misfortunes with wonderful resignation, I am bound to bear my testimony that the discrimination in the way of bounties against those who enlisted for less than a year and who gave their lives in the service of their country, has produced with many a deep sense of wrong and injury, and I feel that we should hasten to relieve the nation from this charge of injustice, which is in truth too well sustained.

Mr. Speaker, I do not wish the House to act blindly on this subject, and would not conceal from it the fact that the bill involves no inconsiderable expenditure. I estimate that there are forty-five hundred and fifty families that would be entitled to claim the benefits of this measure; and a bounty of $200 for each family would involve an expenditure of $900,000. But although the sum is considerable we should not hesitate to vote it; we are doing but simple justice to those by whose fearful sacrifices it is that we have anything to economize or to bestow.

It will be observed that this bill does not authorize the payment of one dollar on account of those who have received bounty, and that it does not apply to the future, but only to the heirs of soldiers now deceased, and does not therefore involve an expenditure that it is to be either continued or increased. So long a period has now elapsed since the war ceased, that in the future it cannot be reasonably claimed that the soldier has died from wounds or disease contracted in the service.

It is impossible to state with exactness the number of beneficiaries which this bill will include, and I have been obliged, in arriving at my conclusions, to assume that the number of deaths in the short service will be in proportion to the length of the terms of enlistment, the same as in the long service. The War Department has furnished me with a statement of the number of enlistments during the war, and the length of service; the whole number being 2,669,832, divided as follows:

For one year		390,597
For two years		44,365
For three years		1,932,209
Whole number for one year and upward to whom this bill does not relate		2,367,171
For less than one year:
Sixty days	296
Three months	108,416
One hundred days	85,507
Four months	42
Six months	20,439
Eight months	373
Nine months	87,588
For less than one year (and it only to the families of this class of soldiers who were killed or died in consequence of the service, that the bill refers)		302,661
Total number		2,669,832

The following is a statement of the number of troops who entered the service for a less term than one year, showing the States and Territories in which they enlisted:

Maine	8,391
New Hampshire	2,682
Vermont	5,563
Massachusetts	27,333
Rhode Island	5,206
Connecticut	8,004
New York	29,916
New Jersey	14,579
Pennsylvania	63,773
Delaware	2,574
Maryland	2,912
West Virginia	2,048
District of Columbia	4,720
Ohio	51,347
Indiana	17,710
Illinois	20,844
Michigan	781
Wisconsin	3,909
Minnesota	930
Iowa	4,869
Missouri	16,590
Kansas	1,091
Tennessee	739
Arkansas	374
Oregon	42
Nebraska Territory	1,228
Colorada	1,342
New Mexico	2,396

The whole number of deaths in the Army, including all enlistments, was 327,588, and as five months is the average of the short terms it gives as the probable number of deaths in the class provided for in this bill, the number before stated, namely, 4,550. I should state that the Second Auditor of the Treasury, Hon. E. B. French, who, from his great experience and intelligence, is perhaps better able to form a correct opinion on this subject than any one else, assures me that my estimate of deaths in the short service is very liberal and will exceed by far the actual number to be provided for.

In justice to the Thirty-eighth Congress it should be stated that it passed an act, which was approved March 3, 1865, (Statutes at Large, volume 13, page 488, section 11,) by which bounties were intended to have been given to the heirs of all soldiers, but being referrred to in said act as "volunteers," the Secretary of War decided that this class of men, having enlisted under the President's call for militia, were not entitled to the benefits of the act; and in consequence thereof the good intentions of Congress were defeated. Now should the proposed bill be concurred in the spirit of that law will be carried out and the long-deferred justice accomplished.

It is not necessary I am sure to appeal for the support of this measure to the gallant and patriotic gentlemen upon this floor who participated in that terrible strife, or to the other members of this House, who, in common with all the people of this land, are to-day enjoying the fruits of that fearful conflict; for it appears to me that the demand is so reasonable and so just that no one will hesitate to grant the desired boon to the widows and orphans of the slain, but that all will gladly embrace the opportunity to perform this act of equity and mercy.

Mr. Speaker, feeling that this brief statement of the merits of this bill might with propriety be made I have ventured thus long to occupy the attention of the House. Permit me in conclusion to add one remark that the old and beautiful maxim which declares that "it is sweet to die for one's country," is only true when one dies with the conviction that he will be remembered with gratitude and the dear ones he leaves behind him with justice.

MOIETIES, SANBORN CONTRACTS, ETC.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, failing health and the imperative direction of my medical adviser of the danger of taking part in a debate which might call for a draught upon physical strength kept me silent upon the debate on the bills repealing the several moiety laws by means of which the collection of taxes had been assured in all civilized nations. Perhaps this inability was not infelicitous, because it now permits me to call the attention of the House to what I deem the dangers to the revenue of so complete a departure from a system begun under Hamilton, sanctioned without interruption by every legislative act without one intended exception; and because this may now be done, too, after the officers lately executing these laws have gone out of office. The personal enmities and feelings which egged on the prosecution of the investigations of the Committee on Ways and Means have subsided or failed in their specific objects; personal ambition and hate, which were its impelling motives, have either been satiated or failed in their purposes; and the bill proposed by the committee having passed the House without a division, what I may now bring to the attention of the House will not have its weight diminished by the allegation of a desire to defeat an alleged measure of reform for personal or private reasons.

I assume the experiment of abolishing moieties is to be tried. I only desire therefore now to raise a warning voice against this experiment as one in the interest of the dishonest and unscrupulous importer and tax-evader, against the interest of the people as well as the honest and conscientious merchant.

What, then, is the moiety system? It is giving certain large rewards to official or other persons who will take upon themselves the unpleasant task—which is the duty of every citizen, but wholly neglected—of exposing frauds upon the Government and evasions of its taxes by those by whom the law requires they shall be paid. This system has been the machinery for preventing frauds in the collection of taxes in all civilized countries from time immemorial. We derive our laws in this regard, as indeed in all others, directly from England. It was declared in the House as an argument against it that the moiety system had been abolished in England. That is true; but the other truth which caused its abolition was not stated in the same connection by either of the gentlemen of the Committee on Ways and Means in their elaborate speeches taking up several days upon this subject, or in the several reports which they have made to the House, covering six hundred pages; and that is, Great Britain has abolished duties upon all articles of importation save seven only, and upon these her tax is substantially a specific and not an ad valorem duty, and she has thrown around those seven articles such safeguards as to compel the honest payment of the imposts upon them; while we have imposed duties, generally ad valorem, on three thousand two hundred and eleven articles of importation of every possible description, and in the value of each of which every customs officer would be required to be skilled and expert in addition to his assured honesty, in order to an accurate collection of the imposed duties; and, in addition, experience shows that he would have to be still more expert as a detective in discovering and thwarting the many devices by which the just dues of the country are evaded and the revenues defrauded by the skilled, expert, and unscrupulous importer.

It has been said and reiterated, "Why cannot the revenue officers collect all the revenues? If they are honest and do their duty, what necessity to have informers and detectives?" The answer is a plain one: The more honest the officer, the more unsuspecting of fraud and the more easily deceived; and you cannot get men for $1,500 a year who are learned in the whole circle of human knowledge as applied to the many thousand articles of use, necessity, and luxury which are imported and taxed by a nation, comprising every variety of climate and every grade of necessity and luxury in its inhabitants, surrounded by a customs line of more than twelve thousand miles, to say nothing of Alaska, over which importations may be made without the payment of duties unless prevented by the customs officers.

Does not this simple statement show the entire impossibility of collecting the just taxes upon this number of articles by the knowledge of the customs officers, to be imported under an ad valorem duty founded upon their valuations, or to protect from smuggling so extended a customs line by any practical number of officials? The Committee on Ways and Means forgot to tell you also that in addition to the number of officers which Great Britain has to supervise the collection of taxes upon goods, she still has a "preventive service," as it is called, with an organized corps of trained officers, covering her whole coast, and watching every bay, inlet, and headland of her island whereon contraband goods can possibly be landed. We have no such service, but officers engaged in collecting revenues upon regularly imported goods only, the special agents of the Treasury and the revenue marine excepted. How, then, can smuggling and the much more extended and injurious crime, the importation of goods by false values and false weight and measurement, be prevented? Only by the imposition of penalties so severe that they will make the hazard of the business more than commensurate with the profits. Now the profits on the undervaluation of a single cargo may be hundreds of thousands, while smuggling must of necessity be of very much less value at the single venture. Therefore the importation at undervaluation and by false weights and measures is much more dangerous to the revenue than any possible smuggling. Yet the committee seem to have directed all their energies to relieving from penalties frauds by undervaluations and cheating by false invoices whereby the greatest wrongs and injuries are inflicted upon the Government, and to have given their attention to the prevention of smuggling, which of necessity must be comparatively innocuous and in much smaller amounts.

The smuggler must hide in nooks and inlets, and bring in his goods by stealth under the cover of darkness. Of necessity they are few and of little cost. The fraudulent importer by a false valuation brings in his goods by the cargo, in three thousand ton steamers plying weekly between New York and Liverpool, and passes them through by a bribed officer at undervaluation on a perjured invoice of a confederate partner house in Europe, cheats the people of the United States out of millions, thereby becomes a "merchant prince," and covers his sins perhaps by building churches or other ostentatious acts of advertising benevolence which bring trade to his house; at the same time he lulls the suspicions and blinds the vigilance of the honest customs officer. For how can he believe that such a benevolent, rich, and praying merchant can be getting the means for his charities by defrauding the revenue, cheating the people out of a million dollars, and giving a thousand in charity that he may not be suspected of the fraud? I hope to convince the House before I get through that this is no fancy picture. Yet from this class of defrauders of the revenue the bill of the committee takes away almost every safeguard, and relieves substantially of every penalty.

Penalties, however severe, will be of no value as a preventive unless it is known that they will be enforced. What does the experience of all time and of all peoples teach us as to the detection of crime where there is great interest to cover it up? This truth: that under such circumstances crime is only to be found out and thwarted by an equal interest in the discoverer and pursuer, and the only safety to the revenue of the country is in the belief of the fraudulent importer that he is liable to be pursued by men whose intellects are sharpened and whose energies are spurred by an equal interest to discover the fraud with that which has impelled him to do the wrong.

It is replied to this that it is to be presumed merchants are all honest; that it is not to be assumed that they defraud the revenue; that as to them all this machinery is useless, all the pains and penalties simply vexatious, and their only application is to injure the innocent importer who may happen to have made mistakes. The committee, however, have again forgotten to tell us that in every case of honest mistake the law gives instant remedy in the remission of all penalties. Penalties can only be inflicted on the merchant when the Secretary of the Treasury cannot be convinced he is honest. An illustration, however, upon this point will give a better idea of the honesty of all merchants than any reasoning. And lest I may be supposed to be prejudiced I will take

THE TEA TRADE OF BOSTON.

The House is aware that our revenue system allows the merchant to bring his goods in without payment of duties and keep them in bond, and in case he desires export them without payment of duties. The House will also do me the favor to remember that up to 1870 we had not a very large duty on tea, but yet enough to excite the cupidity of some "honest merchants." In 1867 there were exported in bond free of duty from Boston to certain small places in the British provinces bordering on the coast of Maine, to wit: Saint Stephens, Saint Andrews, the Island of Grand Menau, Campo Bello, Indian Island, and Saint John's River, 6,738 packages, containing 338,308 pounds of tea. But in the latter part of 1867 one of these "pestiferous informers," upon whom the very vials of wrath of the chairman of the committee were poured out—an informer, aided by a special agent of the Treasury, went down East along the line dividing us from the province of New Brunswick, and commenced a series of suits and seizures which the bill of the committee now forbids, especially seizures of books and papers; and the consequence was that the next year, 1868, at the same ports, only 1,794 packages of tea, amounting to 85,968 pounds, or one quarter as many, were sent there from Boston to be smuggled back into the United States. Does not this conclusively prove the necessity for the use of the informer and the penalty of a moiety given to him to induce him to act for the Government so that he may be willing to be vituperated by the learned chairman of the committee in the following choice language:

"An odious, despised being, from whom everybody shrinks;" "who has no place whatever in decent society;" "who has his accursed employment;" "a vile, festering, putrescent informer," "who takes the wages of sin and iniquity."

Who would not require at least one-half of all the penalties he could get to have such billingsgate thrown at him in the face of the country? Did it ever occur to the chairman that there must be something to inform of before there could be an informer; that the "honest merchant" must have committed a crime before anybody could tell of that crime; that the "honest merchant" must be convicted of defrauding the revenue by a jury, unless he confesses his guilt, before the informer can get a quarter of the penalties of the crime to which the court sentences the criminal? In all this most remarkable ebullition of vituperation the learned chairman finds no word of objurgation or characterization of the dishonest, perjured, fraudulent, smuggling importer, because of whose crimes alone the "pestiferous informer" can exist. Ah! who would not rather be the "merchant prince" who defrauds his government and cheats the people and is false to his country and his God alike, to be praised and be lauded therefor by the Committee on Ways and Means, rather than the citizen who informs the Government of his crimes in order that they may be hindered, stayed, and punished?

To stamp the fact that all this importation of tea in bond from Boston—for I do not take into the account the other ports of the United States—to this province was entirely for the purpose of being smuggled back into the United States by the "honest merchant," I call attention to the fact that in 1870 the duty was taken off tea, and in 1873, with all the increase of population, there was sent from Boston to the same port only twenty-eight packages of tea, amounting to 1,766 pounds, in I find 1,738 packages, containing 338,000 pounds, when it could be smuggled with profit, the duty in the provinces being the same all the while—the duty having changed in this country alone. The table I send to the Clerk's desk will show this better than I have stated it.

The Clerk read as follows:

*So there was no profit in smuggling across the line into the United States.

CUSTOM-HOUSE, BOSTON,
Collector's Office, March 30, 1874.

The foregoing tabular statement was compiled from the records in this office.
[SEAL.] W. A. SIMMONS, Collector.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. But this exporting in bond of a few hundred thousand pounds of tea to half-civilized islands, as I have said before, is but a bagatelle in comparison with the amount of frauds committed upon the revenue by false and fraudulent invoices of high-cost merchandise. I have therefore been at some pains to get for the use of the House some accurate data founded upon statistics, which may be verified by anybody who will take the same pains that I have done, and which cannot be successfully contradicted.

Upon these I make this startling announcement to the House and the country: That the United States does not receive more than two-thirds of her revenue upon all articles on which ad valorem duties are imposed in whole or in part, so that to-day no more than 67 per cent. of our revenues are collected, owing to this class of frauds added to the others of which I have been speaking, or, in other words, if we could collect our revenues according to the present rate of taxation we could pay off yearly more than one hundred millions of the national debt, imposing no greater burdens on the people than now, because all of these revenues of which the country is defrauded are charged to the consumer as if paid by the merchant; so that by these enormous frauds the country is doubly the loser, first in its revenue, and secondly by the consumer paying it to the fraudulent merchant, generally an importer who has a branch of his mercantile house in this country and in the country from which his goods come.

I would not dare, sir, to make this very startling, nay, wonderful and almost incredible statement as to these frauds of undervaluation and false invoices were I not fortified by proof which I bring to the attention of the House, premising only that great as are the frauds with all possible penalties, seizure of books, and moieties to informers, and all the safeguards that the experience of the custom-house officers of England and this country has enabled us to throw around the revenues of the United States, these safeguards and penalties and hinderances to frauds have by the bill of the Committee on Ways and Means almost every one of them been removed.

Now to the proof. Let us take a manufacture which has but just begun in this country.

WORSTED STUFFS.

Fraudulent undervaluations in worsted stuffs of all kinds sent from England to the United States are simply enormous, as the subjoined examples will demonstrate:

Combed, not milled, worsted stuffs exported from Great Britain in one year, total number of yards, 154,206,478. Of these there were sent to the United States 48,542,218 yards; to other countries, 105,664,260 yards Total value as declared in the invoices to the United States, $10,324,741.24; to other countries, $33,331,100.44. Average invoice value per yard to the United States, 21 cents; to other countries where there is no tariff of duties, 39.7 cents. Difference, or undervaluation, 47 per cent. Estimated annual loss on duties on this single class of goods, $3,007,190.40.

OTHER WORSTED STUFFS.

Total exported in five months, 85,299,174 yards; to the United States, 28,442,728 yards; to other countries, 56,856,449 yards. Total declared value to the United States, $5,073,975.28; to other countries, $18,038,050.80. Average per yard to the United States, 18 cents; to other countries, 31½ cents. Difference, or undervaluation, 45 per cent.

LINENS.

Exports in one year to the United States, 70,234,347 yards; total declared value, $10,507,790.04. Average invoice value, 14.9 cents per yard. Exports same year to France, Prussia, and Spain, 7,404,154 yards; total declared value, $1,646,214.72; average invoice value, 24.8 cents per yard. Difference, or undervaluation in linens, sent to the United States, 43 per cent.

LINEN YARNS.

Total exported in one year, 34,002,479 pounds; to the United States, 1,247,457 pounds; other countries, 32,755,022 pounds. Total declared value to the United States, 24 cents per pounds; to other countries, 35 cents per pound. Undervaluation on yarns sent to the United States, 32 per cent.

LINEN DAMASK AND DIAPER.

Exported to all countries in one year, 1,397,077 yards; to the United States, 1,267,390 yards; other countries, 129,687 yards. Total declared value to the United States, $413,311.80; to other countries, $56,081.08. Average per yard to the United States, 32 cents; to other countries, 43 cents. Undervaluation, 26 per cent.

The undervaluation in the exports of carpets from the looms of Kidderminster, Halifax, &c., is enormous. In bags, leather, gloves, percussion caps, &c., the same ratio of undervaluation is shown to exist as in fact it does with all articles paying an ad valorem duty.

The whole needle trade of Redditch and vicinity is carried on on a similar basis. It is like other branches of our foreign trade entirely in the hands of the foreign manufacturer and his resident agent or partner here, thus defying detection and exposure except by the greatest skill stimulated by the highest rewards. Certain it is that all articles of foreign manufacture and importation shipped to the United States are in quality and cost far better than the average shipped to other countries, and therefore the average rate of invoicing should be much higher for the United States, whereas as we have seen it is vastly lower. This fact, therefore, clearly demonstrates such undervaluation is done for the sole purpose of defrauding our revenues.

To show the accuracy of the conclusion it is only necessary to turn to articles which pay purely specific duties. By their undervaluation nothing is to be gained. Take for example—

COTTON GOODS.

Total of heavy printed cotton exported in the same year as above from Great Britain, 715,559,642 yards; to the United States, 27,384,430 yards; other countries, 688,175,212 yards. Total declared value to the United States, $3,258,229.92; to other countries, $72,224,682.20. Average per yard to the United States, 11¾ cents; to other countries, 10½ cents.

LIGHT PRINTED COTTONS.

Total exported same year, 141,604,328 yards; to the United States, 9,324,688 yards; other countries, 132,279,640 yards. Total declared value to the United States, $1,151,591.88; other countries, $13,985,843.08. Average per yard to the United States, 12 cents; to other countries, 10 cents.

Here it will be seen that as soon as we approach goods paying exclusively a specific duty the average rate of invoicing is higher to the United States than to other countries, proving that a better class of goods generally is sent here than to other countries, and leading to the inevitable conclusion that the same difference of higher rates of invoicing would prevail in worsteds, linens, carpets, &c., if they also paid a specific instead of an ad valorem or mixed duty. The same facts are true regarding imports from other countries.

The Committee on Ways and Means may reply to this—which would be the fact—that they have not had these statistics before them. Certainly not. If they have, their report does not show it. They have examined only cases of individual merchants to find out if the laws have worked supposed hardships, and not the case of the people, to see how they are defrauded. The committee put forward most prominently of all, as example of the hardship of the law upon honest men, the case of Phelps, Dodge & Co., making the case of that firm the ground-work for all their recommended legislation; and in their report, and in the debate which followed, and which for days members of the committee had substantially to themselves, no one has uttered a word of animadversion upon Phelps, Dodge & Co. No harsh language is used; all that is reserved for the officer who brought their pleaded guilt to light. In the course of the evidence, as taken before the committee, there seems to be a studied and careful attempt that that firm shall appear to the country as honest and injured merchants, who had, by the devices of the officers of the Government, been robbed of a very large sum of money. All the lawyers and chairmen of boards of trade, and there were many, made it the ground-work of their attacks upon the revenue laws. It went forth as the cheval de bataille of those who desired to take off all effective penalties to prevent frauds in the collection of the revenue.

The facts of this case, as stated by Mr. Dodge, the senior partner, whose testimony as a witness occupied longer time than any other witness save one, and to make room for whom the representative of the National Board of Trade gave way, are these. (Let us premise by saying, however, that none of the active junior partners of the house who swore to the invoices, and were charged with committing the frauds, were sent for by the committee.) Phelps, Dodge & Co., a firm of many years' standing, who had imported between "three and four hundred million dollars' worth of goods, and had paid the United States Government more than fifty millions of duties," very honest—giving the very language of Mr. Dodge—"I will say it with perfect confidence that our good name and our integrity were never assailed in these many years until it was assailed by the Government"—meaning the charge, made by a special agent of the Treasury, of false valuation in December, 1872. Mr. Dodge again reiterates that statement: "The first knowledge or hint in forty-odd years of business that I have had with the Government, that I was accused of any dereliction of duty was, when sitting at the board of one of our large institutions, I received a note from my partner, asking me to come to the custom-house," (in December, 1872;) that thereupon he went, and found his firm accused of having many invoices for five years—which was as far as the Government could go back on account of the statute of limitations—sworn to at a false valuation, for the purpose of defrauding the revenue; and that the books and papers of the firm touching those importations would be seized if not voluntarily produced to the officers. Thereupon, yielding to the necessity, his books and papers were produced, and from those books and papers the special agent of the Treasury made up an account, first, of $260,000, but afterward coming up to the enormous sum of $271,000, the amount of articles in the invoices in which "simple mistakes" only, as Mr. Dodge now declares, had been made in stating their value, by which the Government had lost duties to the amount of some sixteen hundred dollars only. But Phelps, Dodge & Co., fearing that these "simple mistakes" would hold them guilty in a court, and being "subject to a system of terrorism" which they could not withstand, in order to save themselves from the oppressions of the Government officials, in entire consciousness of integrity and innocence of all intended or actual wrong, after they had taken counsel of four most eminent lawyers, and after reflecting upon the subject for more than six weeks, made an offer of compromise of penalties for the crime of importation by false invoices, which they confessed in writing they had done, and paid this very great sum of money into the Treasury, as penalty.

This is the statement, in brief, as Mr. Dodge puts it forward in connection with the record. He admits that the house of Phelps, Dodge & Co. has had, for many years, a branch house in Liverpool—Phelps, James & Co.—which was substantially the same in interest as the house in New York, composed of the same Phelps and the same James as the house in New York. To exclude all conclusion that this Mr. James of this firm in Liverpool did any wrong, Mr. Dodge tells us that Mr. James joined the firm and removed to Liverpool—

> Where, for over forty years, he has been the resident partner, sustaining the character of a high-minded, respected, and honorable merchant, and for a number of years past the oldest American merchant in England; his name a synonym of honesty and uprightness, and shedding a luster on his own country and American merchants; gratified by the honors conferred abroad, but ever looking with pride, as an American citizen, for protection to his own country. In all this time not a question had ever arisen as to the vast shipments made to the house in New York. On entering his office one day in December, 1872, he found the following dispatch, in leaded lines, in the newspapers:
> "PHELPS, DODGE & CO., NEW YORK.—This great firm have had their books and papers seized by the United States for alleged frauds on the revenue to the amount of $1,750,000."
> I will not attempt to describe the feelings of such a man. I will simply say that the shock came well-nigh killing him; nor has he ever entirely recovered. He felt that a life-long reputation, dearer to him than aught else, had been struck down, in a moment, by his own Government, on which he had depended for protection. He had passed his three-score and ten until then with an unblemished character, and felt that, at least, he had a right to demand that he should be "considered innocent till proved guilty." Can a law liable to produce such results be just?

If this account of Mr. Dodge is in the main true; nay, if it is found to be true in any substantial portion; if his firm had maintained always a name for integrity and honesty of dealing with the Government; if his statement about Mr. James be true, that "in all this time not a question had ever arisen as to the vast shipments made to the house in New York," then I agree "that a law liable to produce such results not only is unjust" and should be repealed, but that it is the duty of the United States Government to condignly punish the officers who have done so gross a wrong to such honorable men, and not only to repay them the money that has been extorted from them, but to give them a very large sum as some slight reparation for the unqualified wrong and unheard-of injury without just cause committed upon them. But if all these statements are not true, in substance or in fact; if the whole story in all its essential parts is as false as the perjured invoices under which Phelps, Dodge & Co. pleaded guilty that they passed their goods without tax into the country, then the law that catches perjured scoundrels and smuggling villains and punishes them, however severely, ought to be sustained and made more stringent, not less.

The first statement of Mr. Dodge which challenges attention is whether the house in New York and Liverpool has, until the latter part of December, 1872, always borne this unblemished reputation without fault or blot, which he states; and have the dealings of that house with the Government been always just and true, as Christian "merchant princes" ought to have dealt with the Government? Because, if that be so, it can hardly be believed that for a comparatively small sum of money a house of such wealth and good repute has suddenly become so vile and so criminal as they confessed themselves to be in their letter to the Secretary of the Treasury when they desired to "settle" with the Government for their crimes. If, on the other hand, it is found that this firm have been cheating this Government for long years, then we shall conclude that they have only been caught at their old tricks.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is a notorious fact to everybody having to do with importations in New York officially for many years past that the house of Phelps, Dodge & Co. have been confessed to be guilty of the most petty and outrageous smuggling, taking advantage of all technical points to get their goods in without paying duties that could be most ingeniously conceived.

A harsh accusation this, you say. Yes, and one that ought not to be made unless it can be made good. Well, then, sir, many years ago, since the forty years that Mr. James has been resident partner of the house in Liverpool and interested in the house in New York, during which time Dodge says not a question has been raised as to the vast shipments of this house, and since Phelps, Dodge & Co. have been one of the largest importers in the country of lead, tin, and other metals, the Congress of the United States passed a law to encourage American art, a law which in various phases you will find on your statute-books as the tariff was revised from time to time, which was in effect that statuary of American artists should come in free. Whereupon this firm, of which Mr. James, this "honest, honored merchant," was resident partner and consignor, had hundreds and thousands of tons of lead and block-tin and copper cast into statuettes of the Goddess of Liberty and Washington and Jefferson, and imported them into this country as works of American art, thereby escaping the duty. But when here they were taken from the hold of the vessel to the warehouse, and from the warehouse went to the melting-pot, being sold to their customers for pig-lead and tin.

Now, right here, I challenge any honest, just-minded man to look me in the face and say that an "honest merchant" or a "Christian gentleman" ever did such a thing to cheat his government, whether a James of Liverpool or a Dodge of New York. And yet this Dodge tells us that the "first knowledge or hint, in forty-odd years of business that I have had with the Government, that I was accused of any dereliction of duty" was in December, 1872. Was that true? So far from its being true, Mr. Speaker, Congress had to change this very law about American statuary on account of these fraudulent importations and cheating of the revenue of which I have spoken by this very firm; and this firm was accused of this fraud upon the revenue on the 1st day of March, 1865, on this very floor. I send to the Clerk to be read an extract from the Congressional Globe of that date, part two, second session Thirty-eighth Congress, page 1255. The fifth section of the tariff bill was under discussion, and was as follows:

> And be it further enacted, That the term statuary, as used in the laws now in force imposing duties on foreign importations, shall be understood to include professional productions of a statuary or of a sculptor only.
> Mr. KERNAN. I desire some explanation of this section. I should like to know what this unprofessional statuary is. Has this provision reference to those people who import leaden statues of Liberty, &c.?
> Mr. MORRILL. I may state, in brief, that it has been found that parties have in many cases evaded the payment of duties by importing articles in the form of statuary when they could not legitimately rank as such. In some instances lead has been thus imported to a large extent. We had a law by which statuary was admitted free; and statues of the "Father of his Country" and of the "Author of the Declaration of Independence" were brought over in that way. I believe that the gentleman is answered.
> Mr. ELDREDGE. I would like to know from the gentleman from Vermont whether this does not refer to one particular firm. I want to know whether this does not refer to PHELPS, DODGE & CO., and that firm alone.
> Mr. STEVENS. When statuary was admitted free we had statues of Webster and Clay and others in copper and lead imported, and so soon as they were landed and taken out of the custom-house they were melted down. IT WAS A FRAUD UPON THE REVENUE.
> Mr. ELDREDGE. What firm did that?
> Mr. STEVENS. Phelps, Dodge & Co.

Now, as Mr. Dodge himself came into Congress as a member of this House at the very next session, one would have supposed that he would have arisen to explain if this very grave charge upon the president of the Young Men's Christian Association was not true. So far the record. I am told, and I believe, that there are men in this House who know the fact that Mr. Dodge himself admitted before the Committee of Ways and Means of a former House, when questioned, that these importations were made. The fact never has been denied, and can be easily substantiated. Imagine the fine feelings of this old Mr. James, the "honored merchant" of Liverpool, when he was loading up this fraudulent statuary to cheat the revenue of his country!

I have no doubt that it was quite true, as Dodge states, that when James heard that Phelps, Dodge & Co.'s books had been seized in New York in 1873 he nearly fell dead, or that it almost killed him, for he knew how fraudulent their acts were, and always had been, and feared the consequences. There was a merchant of high standing in Boston not many years ago who, when charged with frauds upon the revenue, made confession by committing suicide.

Importing of lead and tin and copper in the form of statuary was by no means the most serious attack of this firm upon the revenues of the Government for their own benefit. Cast your mind back, Mr. Speaker, to April, 1864, the very darkest hours of the war, when Grant was reorganizing the Army of the Potomac for his march on Richmond; when every patriotic man was preparing himself for the final great struggle; when the nation needed every dollar that it could command, and when it became necessary to add one-half to our revenues by taxation to sustain our falling credit, with gold at 180. What shall we say of a firm which in that trying hour of the nation's peril exercised its infernal ingenuity in devising ways and means to defraud our impoverished Treasury of millions, and succeeded in so doing?

To meet the exigency we were obliged to pass a joint resolution providing that until the end of sixty days 50 per cent. of the rates of duties imposed by law should be added to the then present duties and imposts on all goods, wares, and merchandise, so that we might have time in which to adjust the tariffs; and then, just sixty days from that time, to wit, on the 30th of June, we passed an "Act to increase the duties on imports." It covered nearly all importations, and, among other things, it provided—

On tin plates, and iron galvanized or coated with any metal by electric batteries or otherwise, 2½ cents a pound.

At this time, if ever, Mr. Speaker, it became all patriotic men, all lovers of the country, to do everything that possibly could be done to aid the revenues of the country, to sustain its credit and enable the soldiers to receive their pay, and to support the armies in the field. Let us see, then, what the course of this firm of Christian merchants, Phelps, Dodge & Co., was in that crisis of their country's need. They were the largest importers of tin plates in the country, and that article is one of the largest of their importations. As we shall see in a moment, it ought to yield a large revenue. The duty upon it at that time was 25 per cent. ad valorem, which would be about 1¼ cents per pound. It was the intention of Congress to increase it; therefore they enacted that "on tin plates, and iron galvanized or coated," &c., there should be a duty of 2½ cents a pound. But Mr. William E. Dodge went to the Treasury Department of the United States, in his own person, as I have the means of showing, and there advocated a reading of that law which was sanctioned neither by the letter, text, spirit, nor meaning, nor by the true and just thought of any patriot. He procured an opinion from the Treasury Department by which the comma was construed to be removed after the word "plates" and inserted after the word "iron," so as to make it read:

On tin plates and iron, galvanized or coated with any metal by electric batteries or otherwise, 2½ cents a pound.

So that, with that construction, the duty had not been raised on tin plates at all, but only on "galvanized" tin plates. Who ever heard of a galvanized tin plate? None was ever imported, I venture to say, or ever will be. The consequence was, that all the tin plates imported into the United States, of which Phelps, Dodge & Co. were by far the largest importers, came in at 25 per cent. ad valorem instead of 2½ cents a pound, which was a very large increase of duty. I send a table to the Clerk to show how this would operate in favor of Phelps, Dodge & Co. I have not been able to obtain the statistics of their importations in 1864–'65, but I have their importations for 1870–'71, in which, taking the average both of weight and value, the following result is shown.

Imports of tin plates by Phelps, Dodge & Co. for the year 1870–'71.

1870, (boxes)	585,378
1871, (boxes)	734,112

Amount of duty at ad valorem rate of 25 per cent	1,756,241
Difference in favor of importer	2,367,165

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Showing, it seems to me clearly, even admitting that my average may be considerably out of the way, a difference of at least 100 per cent. in favor of the ad valorem rate.

Whether that average value is precisely correct or not is of no consequence, because it would not substantially vary the figures, and that shows that in 1870–'71, and every other year from 1864 until the change of the tariff on June 6, 1872, would make a difference in favor of Phelps, Dodge & Co. and against the United States by this change of the law at the personal solicitation of William E. Dodge with the Treasury officers of the United States of $2,367,000, and over four millions annually, taking the whole importation of the United States during that eight years.

We have heard, in the matter of the duty on fruits, the earnest denunciations of the Committee on Ways and Means of the Treasury Department for not paying attention to the position of a comma, by which $300,000 were refunded; but the Committee on Ways and Means have told the House nothing of the effect in favor of Phelps, Dodge & Co., not solely of looking out for a comma, but the deliberate taking of a comma from one part of a law, where it had been placed by Congress, and putting it in another place where there was none, by which quite four millions of revenue were lost to the Government annually during a period of eight years, and that in favor of the fraudulent importer. In verification of this, I send to the clerk a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury of July 22, 1864, and I beg him to read the portion between the brackets.

The Clerk read as follows:

SIR: Your letter of the 12th instant is received, requesting to be instructed in writing in relation to the proper construction of the language of the second paragraph on the ninth page of the printed tariff of June 30, 1864, viz: "On tin plates, and iron galvanized or coated with any metal by electric batteries, or otherwise, 2½ cents per pound."

It would appear that an error of punctuation has been made by some one; most probably by the clerk who engrossed that part of the act. If the comma which is inserted after the word "plates" be omitted, and a comma placed after the word "iron," the true sense will be had, which unquestionably is, that the tin plates, as well as the iron, must be galvanized or coated with any metal by electric batteries, or otherwise, in order to bring them within the provision.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. And that construction remains even unto this day. For we find in the authorized tariff of the Treasury Department, published after the act of June 6, 1872, which took off 10 per cent. from the duties, the following remarkable announcement:

Tin plates, galvanized or coated with any metal otherwise than by electric batteries, 2½ cents per pound. Ordinary tin plates, or tins other than the above, 15 per cent. ad valorem.

And yet, with this vast fraud upon the revenue by this firm staring them in the face, if they had chosen to examine it, the Committee on Ways and Means have recommended the diminution of duty on tin plates, upon the petition of Phelps, Dodge & Co., to 1 cent per pound, and passed the bill through under suspension of the rules.

Mr. DAWES. No, sir; one cent and a quarter, against their protest.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Ah! One cent and a quarter. Which was against their protest, the one cent or the quarter cent?

Mr. DAWES. I gave you a fair answer, sir.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Certainly, sir. I suppose you would not give any other. What made you think you would?

Mr. DAWES. You did not treat it fairly. Ordinarily such an answer would be fairly treated.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Wait a moment. I will read the memorial sent to Congress on this subject:

To the honorable Finance Committee of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

Your memorialists—merchants, importers, dealers, and workers of tin plates—respecfully request that you will consider the expediency and recommend to Congress the conversion of its present ad valorem duty on the import of tin plates into a corresponding and equivalent specific duty, as a measure calculated to simplify and increase the collection of customs revenue

* * * * * * *

The importations of tin plates during the last two fiscal years were in value as follows:

1872.—Amount in value imported	$12,312,428
1873.—Amount in value imported	14,993,650
Total value	27,306,078

That with an ad valorem duty of 15 per cent. the accruing revenue would have amounted on this importation to $4,095,761.70.

But the actual weight imported during the above two years was:

	Pounds.
1872.—Gross weight, including boxes	209,671,640

which import, at a specific duty of one cent per pound gross weight, (or including the weight of the packages,) would have yielded a revenue of $4,237,410.14. The difference in two years' revenue receipts, therefore, between the present ad valorem and the recommended specific rate of duty, would have been only $141,648.44, or about $70,000 per annum, and that $70,000 in favor of the revenue.

Who do you suppose signed this memorial? The first signature is that of Phelps, Dodge & Co., of New York.

Mr. DAWES. But you said that we passed through here a bill making the duty one cent a pound, on their petition. Now look at the bill, and it will show that the duty as fixed by this House was one cent and a quarter per pound, which is an increase over the present tariff; and that is their complaint which they have carried to the other end of the Capitol.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. And have got it down there, I believe, to one and one-tenth of a cent.

Mr. DAWES. No matter what they have got it down to there. Your charge was against the present Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. They came here and asked for a duty of one cent per pound; and you put it upon tin plates, wooden boxes, iron packages, and all at one and a quarter. Is not that so?

Mr. DAWES. And does not that make more for them to pay?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Does it?

Mr. DAWES. Does it not make more to put the duty on the boxes as well as the tin?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No, sir. There is a specific duty now on the packages, which is not to be collected when you put on the duty by the pound. But however that may be, one cent. and a quarter per pound is not two cents and a half.

Mr. DAWES. Your charge was against the Committee on Ways and Means. Will you please stick to that?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No, sir; I have got through with them for the present.

Mr. DAWES. Because you are answered.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The facts between us are all before the country.

Mr. DAWES. You ought to leave your statements as they are then.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Now, having disposed of that difference of a quarter of a cent a pound between me and the learned chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, [Mr. DAWES,] I find I must hasten on.

Such being the undeniable recorded facts in regard to Phelps, Dodge & Co., what was the special agent of the Treasury to believe when he found them charged with fraud, especially when false and double invoices were produced to him in December, 1872? Why, he could not but believe that these men were continuing to take all manner of unfair, fraudulent, and swindling advantages of the Government, and doubtless he examined their books with that belief. And what did he find? He found that they had a corresponding house in Liverpool, and that that house was engaged in consigning invoices of tin plates to the house of Phelps, Dodge & Co. in this country daily, and sometimes three or four invoices per day; that in every case those invoices were sworn to as a purchaser's invoice—that is, that the goods had been purchased in open market by the house of Phelps, James & Co., and that the prices annexed to the articles therein were the true and genuine prices paid for them. But he found that in the only kind of tin plates in which they could cheat—because the prices of the ordinary kind of tin plates were as staple as gold eagles would have been if imported by that firm—in every instance they had a double invoice from the manufacturer, and that those specially large sizes of tin were not purchased by Phelps, Dodge & Co. or Phelps, James & Co. in open market at all, but were manufactured for those firms, which are one and the same firm; and that in every instance, when they swore they had bought these articles in open market, they swore falsely, and knew it, because they knew the article was manufactured to order for their firm, and they should have sworn to the cost price of the manufactured article, which he found each time had been in the possession of the firm before the oath was made, and it was a higher cost than the invoice price to which they made oath. So that they and those whom they employed had been guilty of deliberate and corrupt perjury every day in the year and every year of our Lord for the five during which the law allowed the officer to look back. And he found the evidence of that in this: That every one of these custom-house invoices, of which they had duplicates in the books of the firm, had a thin paper copy of the true manufacturer's cost pasted over it, in order that the firm might know how to sell at a proper price the goods which they had undervalued so as to smuggle them by false invoices into the country.

Under these circumstances the special agent reported to the Secretary of the Treasury the facts. Mr. William E. Dodge employed four lawyers—Mr. Abram Wakeman, a former surveyor of the port of New York, and a learned lawyer in revenue law; Mr. Henry E. Knox, candidate for supreme judge of New York; Judge Fullerton, the foremost criminal lawyer in the city of New York; with a gentleman who had been Attorney-General of the United States, as consulting counsel; and those lawyers, after examining his case carefully for six weeks, advised him three times over to offer to pay the value of every falsified-invoice article; which falsified-invoice articles amounted to more than a quarter of a million dollars—$271,000, to get released from these frauds, and Mr. William E. Dodge and his partners, after full consultation, agreed to that proposition, nay, ardently desired it, and made a written statement to the Secretary of the Treasury that on account of "certain irregularities" which had been found in their business they were willing to pay $271,000 to compromise a suit which the district attorney in the mean time had, at their request, brought against them for a million dollars, or less than two-thirds of the whole amount of their tainted or fraudulent invoices. That suit was brought in that form at the request of the counsel of Dodge, after the compromise had been agreed upon, in order that when that compromise should be accepted it might cover every claim for penalties against Phelps, Dodge & Co.

When the letter offering to pay that great sum came to the Secretary of the Treasury, GEORGE S. BOUTWELL, he wrote back in substance—all of which will be found in the testimony—"I cannot accept this compromise. I will not be put in the position which that offer will put me, of being a blackmailer. Either you have committed fraud or you have not committed fraud. If you have not committed fraud, you should not pay the Government anything. I will consider the question of compromise, but I cannot compromise under your statement that you are guilty of irregularities only." Thereupon that offer was modified by Phelps, Dodge & Co., after consultation with their four eminent counsel, who advised their client to plead guilty to a suit charging them with importing goods to a million dollars in value by false invoices and fraudulent appliances; and thereupon Phelps, Dodge & Co. sent an offer of compromise, admitting their guilt individually and collectively, and renewing their offer to pay the $271,000; and while the Secretary of the Treasury was considering it they withdrew the offer.

Meantime the matter had got into the newspapers; the Christian Association, of which Mr. William E. Dodge was a burning and a shining light, began to inquire, What manner of man is this who makes long sermons by day and prayers by night in the temples while his partners in business are accumulating his profits by daily and hourly perjuries and frauds upon the Government? And William E. Dodge wrote, as the testimony shows, to GEORGE S. BOUTWELL, and said to him in substance, "I withdraw my offer of compromise." He expected the Secretary to answer to that, "I cannot permit the withdrawal, as the matter is closed." Then Dodge would doubtless have gone away and said, "The compromise was inadvertently made, and when I went to withdraw it the Secretary took a snap-judgment upon me." But the Secretary, with his usual straightforwardness, wrote in substance: "Very well; if you think you are not guilty withdraw your compromise and go to a jury." So the compromise was withdrawn. Thereupon Dodge consults again with his four lawyers; and after nearly two weeks' delay he renews the offer and the money is paid. In order to break his fall he says to the Secretary, "The Government officers think that I ought not to withdraw the compromise, they having once accepted it I am bound to carry it out." What was the manly and honorable and straightforward answer to that of the Secretary of the Treasury? It was, "Mr. Dodge, if your action in renewing the proposition has been influenced by this representation, you will have an opportunity to consider the subject anew and take such course as you may think proper before final action by this Department." Finding no subterfuge would avail, Mr. William E. Dodge, with his four lawyers behind him, after weeks of such consultation and such shifts and such attempts at evasion as I have described, deliberately put on file a written statement admitting that his firm were guilty of the charges in suit; that by these false and fraudulent invoices the revenue had been defrauded; and paid $271,000 in expiation of that guilt.

The SPEAKER. The hour of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BECK. There are a number of gentlemen who want to speak; I am pretty early on the list myself. I am perfectly willing that half of my time should be taken by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I want to have it understood whether this argument is to be all on one side, and all to be made by the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It is a great deal like the argument of the committee a few days ago; they had two days.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. The gentleman from Massachusetts had been three times invited to be present and take part in the discussion. All I desire to know is whether or not other gentlemen are to succeed the gentleman from Massachusetts, or will members of the Committee on Ways and Means have an opportunity to be heard?

Cries of "Go on." "Go on."

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am in the hands of the House.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I do not object to the gentleman's going on. But I desire to have it understood that there are two gentlemen other than members of the Committee on Ways and Means who are to speak after the gentleman from Massachusetts gets through and before any member of the Committee on Ways and Means can be heard.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I do not care who speaks after me.

Mr. FOSTER. We want this matter understood. If those two gentlemen who have the floor after the gentleman from Massachusetts gets through are to speak an hour each that will make a great difference.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I do not know how long they will speak. But if you will allow me to go on, we are wasting good time here.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is not entitled to the floor any longer except by some arrangement that may be made. The rules of the House are specific that no gentleman shall speak more than one hour.

Mr. FOSTER. Who will follow the gentleman from Massachusetts?

The SPEAKER. There has been a list made out——

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I move to suspend the rules in order that the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts may be extended.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has not the floor for that purpose.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to have this thing understood.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I want it understood, too.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not object——

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Why do not you keep quiet, then?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that it would be only the ordinary fairness of debate that members of the Committee on Ways and Means should have the right to follow the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have no objection to that; I only wish they would not interrupt me now.

Mr. GARFIELD. I understand that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] has yielded the half of his hour to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BECK. If I have an hour I will yield the half of it.

Mr. GARFIELD. If that is the case then I do not think there need be any trouble.

Mr. NIBLACK. The gentleman from Massachusetts was ill when this debate was going on. We all wanted to hear him then, and I hope he will be permitted to proceed now.

The SPEAKER. Is it understood that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] has the floor indefinitely, or for only a specific time?

Mr. DAWES. I understand that the gentleman has half of the hour of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have that much; I do not know how much more.

Mr. MAYNARD. Is there not some way to settle this matter by some motion?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have eleven to one to speak against me; I do not care about this thing, however.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I believe that my name is next on the list on the Speaker's table. I am willing to give at least twenty minutes of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would ask the gentleman from Massachusetts how much more time he wants?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Not much more; but I do not want to feel cramped for time.

Mr. MAYNARD. Then I move to suspend the rules so that the gentleman from Massachusetts may have another hour.

Mr. FOSTER. There is no need of making that motion.

Mr. FORT. I hope the motion will be put.

The motion to suspend the rules was seconded; and (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended.

[The announcement of the result was greeted by applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

The SPEAKER. It is a gross infraction of the rules of the House and of decency for the galleries to manifest approbation or disapprobation of any action of members of this House. And the Chair will put in active effect his power to clear the galleries if this is repeated. The slightest manifestation of applause or disapprobation will cause the galleries to be cleared.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Phelps, Dodge & Co. paid the $271,000 in expiation of that guilt. And yet we are told "all merchants are honest," and Phelps, Dodge & Co. are the very princes of merchants. Nay, Mr. William E. Dodge claims he comes here before your committee, as I understand, as president of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of New York, as the exemplar of the merchant, as a dealer in hardware ties up his goods and puts a specimen pair of shears on the outside, so that we may know the quality of the cutting instruments inside without opening the package.

To show you that I cannot be mistaken in this matter, I have caused to be prepared and will send to the Clerk to be read a table showing how frauds on the revenue have grown up and how necessary these penalties are to their detection and punishment. It appears that in 1792 the whole amount of forfeitures, fines, and penalties derived from the frauds of the merchants of that period was $118; in 1797, $220; in 1798, $8; and in 1873, it was $1,261,175.

The Clerk read as follows:

NOTE.—The percentage column shows the fractional part of 1 per cent. of the amount received from fines, penalties, and forfeitures on the whole amount of customs. In the years ommitted the percentage is so small as to be insignificant.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Is anything more needed to prove that the dishonest importer, with his false invoices, his branch on the other side to undervalue his goods, his false appliances to deceive the customs officers, has quite driven the honest merchants out of the business and left it in hands such as these?

Men of the House of Representatives, it is to shield such as these that we have voted to take off the penalties imposed upon defrauders of the revenue by false invoices and smuggling importers! Let me not be misunderstood. This experiment must be tried before the people will understand how greatly they are defrauded and wronged. I do not oppose its trial. If I had intended to have done so I should have begun my opposition earlier. The result will be that you will find a great diminution of your revenues in the coming year. You will be called upon to pass laws to raise more revenue at the next session; and I have no doubt that the committee will recommend to put the tax on tea and coffee and on friction-matches, and the comforts and necessities of the people. Instead of that, if I am here, I shall ask you so to adjust the penalties for defrauding the revenue, and make them so stringent, and so sustain and reward the officers who fearlessly do their duty, that upon the silks, the worsted stuffs, the laces, the satins, the jewels and the velvets, and the plate-glass, and the luxuries of the rich, such tariff may be honestly collected as will pay the expenses of the administration of your Government from the coffers of your Treasury.

I might well stop here, but there is another branch of the system of collecting Government dues by giving moieties which naturally ranges itself alongside the customs moiety. The practice of the Treasury Department for many years, without the sanction of law, until the 8th of May, 1872, of collecting delinquent taxes and old claims and debts due the United States, that had passed out of the usual channels of administration for years, was by giving a contract for moieties to the informer or collector. One of the earlier Secretaries who found the necessity of it was Mr. Guthrie, of Kentucky, and it began with his administration of the Department. It has been continued by every Secretary thereof downward until Mr. BOUTWELL came into office, who wholly refused to give out such contracts until they were sanctioned by law. Congress passed such law in 1872, and under it several contracts were made which proved fruitless. Finally a contract was given to Mr. John D. Sanborn, under which, in nine months, he collected $427,000 of delinquent and withheld taxes, and received one-half, he paying all the expenses.

These delinquent taxes arose in this way: There was a tax upon estates of deceased persons, but the law was repealed in 1870. Another class of these delinquent taxes were taxes upon dividends by railroads and other large corporations. The law for these also was repealed at the same time. There was another tax upon incomes of men who had large revenue and had neglected or refused to return them and pay the tax as was their duty by law to do, and the law for that tax had been also repealed. The law establishing the office of assessor had also been repealed, and as the collector's duty had been only to collect the list of the taxes given him by the assessor, and as indeed it was in doubt whether the taxes could be collected at all without they were assessed, it will be seen that the whole of these classes of taxes were in danger of being wholly lost to the Government. So that the collection of these delinquent and past taxes had run down to substantially a nominal sum in comparison with their great amount, and this, too, without any special fault of the internal-revenue officers. Their collection could not be enforced without suits, and no revenue officer was authorized to incur that expense on behalf of the Government.

The amount of these taxes thus behind, and that had been behind for three or four years at the time Sanborn undertook his contract, is simply enormous. Sanborn testifies that he had knowledge of some five millions of income and other taxes due from property-owners in Europe, to get the data of which he had spent a large sum of money. I have in my hand—which I will make a part of the record—a list of taxes due from railroad companies still uncollected, the evidence of which has been fully investigated, but which the party giving me this list does not wish to disclose since the report of the committee repealing the law, because he says the knowledge has cost him money, labor, and time, and he does not choose to give it to the United States. I may say, however, that this person is not Mr. Sanborn; but I have no doubt of its entire accuracy.

And these are but a small part of the sums behind, which are justly due the United States, and are of the same kind of taxes which honest men have been obliged to pay. Now the question is, whether it was well by moieties to collect these many millions of dollars which are owed to the United States by the dishonest men who have evaded and escaped, either those who have received legacies left by rich relatives or by corporations which have not made returns of their dividends or surplus profits, or by men who have received incomes in this country and have refused to make the returns thereof to the tax-gatherer; or shall we allow these vast sums to remain uncollected and the Government to be defrauded of them, or give a portion, and a large portion perhaps, to somebody who will bear the expense, give the labor, and bear the odium of enforcing their payment?

Sanborn was going on in good faith, as he testifies, having expended the principal part of the very large sum of money which he received as moiety, the money which he did collect in gathering up information by which these debts to the Government might be collected; and he would have collected some millions if he had been allowed to pursue his investigations under the contract.

The Committee on Ways and Means have taken some three hundred pages of testimony; have examined everybody in every possible form, and they have failed to find any illegal act done by Sanborn in collecting these taxes, or that he ever attempted to collect any tax that was not due, or return any to any one of the revenue officers who offered to assist him that was not due, or that he failed to return to the Treasury any moneys collected. At least the report of the committee does not show the contrary. It is objected against him by the committee, among other things, that he put in a large number of railroads in his contract as defaulters when he had not examined the books of all of them. But he testifies that he had examined a hundred and fifty of them by himself and his agents, and he found every one of them delinquent in taxes to the United States, and he assumed that the others were in like condition. At least he thought it safe to swear that he believed they were, which was all that the law required when he made his affidavit to the Treasury Department.

Mr. Sanborn collected from the Delaware and Lackawanna Railroad Company the large delinquent tax, of years standing, of $99,685.24; and the Committee on Ways and Means gravely report collusion with somebody in the Treasury in order to do that, because the very day after the check from the railroad company officer was sent Mr. Sanborn wrote to the Treasury that the check had been sent, and gave the number of the check. Now, your committee ask, how could Mr. Sanborn have known that unless he had been in collusion with somebody in the Treasury, because Mr. Odell, the treasurer of the railroad, swears nobody knew the amount of that check but the president of the road, himself, and his clerk. What a wise and penetrating committee; as only three persons knew of the check, and therefore a fourth person must have told about it!

Now it so happens, as I am informed, that this very clerk was the very man who gave Sanborn the information as to the delinquency of this railroad in its taxes, and the man, of course, who told him of the check which he as clerk had written. Any one who examines the testimony will come to the conclusion that this great amount never would have been collected, some of it having been for nearly four years overdue, if it had not been for the moiety system under which Sanborn was operating.

But there is one very curious fact about this delinquent tax of this railroad of nearly $100,000, which shows how the fraud runs in a line through some men. It is said, "If you scratch a Russian you will find a Tartar underneath;" and it so happens if you scratch one of the firm of Phelps, Dodge & Co., you will always find a defrauder of the revenue, for it turns out that the chairman of the finance committee of this railroad which was delinquent in this $100,000 tax was Mr. William E. Dodge, of the firm of Phelps, Dodge & Co., the "Christian gentleman" and the "honest merchant," whose firm imports as American works of art leaden statues of the Goddess of Liberty, even at the risk of having her nose bruised when she is thrown into the melting-pot to come out as lead pipe

But it is not my purpose at this hour of the evening, nor would it be of advantage, to go into examination of this system of collection of delinquent taxes. It has been long in practice; it has commended itself to administrative officers heretofore; it has its uses; it has its defects and disadvantages; and although some four to six millions, which in my belief never will be got without it, might have been got under it, yet as the House has chosen to repeal it, and as it only deals with past debts and delinquent taxes, it passes out of the line of my duty as a legislator, especially as the whole internal revenues in the future do not depend in any degree upon it, as do our customs revenues upon the other part of the moiety system. It is well enough to try the experiment of repealing this law and finding out whether the Commissioner of Internal Revenue can make the collections Nor is it my duty or purpose to defend Mr. Sanborn, whether he did well or ill. That is his affair. I did not promote his getting the contract. I had nothing to do with its fulfillment by him. If the law is an unwise one let it be repealed, and in that I have neither more nor less interest or wish than every other member of this House. But I take leave to say that it is not brave nor manly in those gentlemen who passed the law to make scape-goats of the officers who execute the law they passed.

The Committee on Ways and Means have spent several months and a large amount of money in seeming examination of the question of the propriety of the law, and if that time and money were spent in good faith to ascertain whether the law of May 8, 1872, giving the moiety contracts to those who should collect old debts ought to be repealed, it may have been well spent. If on the contrary this apparent purpose of investigation has only been to cloak another and a different one, carried on for political and personal purposes only, then the committee and the House may find that they have been made in this matter simply instruments to pander to the rivalries, hates, and ambitions of politicians, instead of carrying on a great work of necessary legislation.

I have some evidence showing that the whole Sanborn contract investigation was gotten up not exactly for those objects and those designs which wise legislators and grave statesmen would willingly avow.

The first the country heard anything about these Sanborn contracts was that Mr. Sanborn was being indicted in Brooklyn by the district attorney of that district, one Tenney, about the 1st of February last. As soon as that was done and duly trumpeted in the opposition newspapers, Mr. Tenney, an office-holder under a republican administration and claiming to be a republican himself, sent his assistant district attorney here to one of the Committee on Ways and Means, a leading democratic member of the House, to have him bring the Sanborn-contract matter "to the front," Tenney having furnished him with the Brooklyn democratic papers which gave flaming and laudatory accounts of Mr. Tenney's able endeavors, as they termed it, to ferret out a great fraud on the Government. One item of evidence that I have of this fact is a letter of direction to his assistant, written by Tenney to his assistant, which I send to the Clerk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

LAW OFFICES OF TENNEY & HOLT,
178 Broadway, New York, February 6, 1874.

FRIEND HUGHES: Do not fail to see Hon. JAMES B. BECK. He is a democratic member from Kentucky. He is member also of the Committee on Ways and Means. I have to-day sent him Union and Eagle. He is a powerful member of the democratic party, and will bring this Sanborn matter to the front. I think no news specially.

Yours, &c.,

TENNEY.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Now, if republican office-holders will put ammunition into the hands of democratic members on the Committee on Ways and Means with which to attack and break down the republican Administration, far be it from me to say one word in animadversion upon the conduct of that democratic member of the House who should make the best use he can of that information for that object. He should "bring it to the front," and charge upon the Administration, and attempt to show its great corruption and wrong-doings. He ought, if he is permitted so to do, to drive out of office its Secretary of the Treasury and its Assistant Secretary of the Treasury and its Solicitor of the Treasury, and show that they were all corrupt together and bad men. He should make violent and denunciatory speeches against the Administration, founded on the material that republican officers and a republican committee of the House will furnish him for that use. He does his duty, his full duty, in so doing as an opposition member of the House, and I applaud him for his ingenuity, his boldness, efficiency, and perseverance; and I congratulate him upon the result. It is not often that a republican committee of a republican House force a republican administration to allow a democratic member to carry off at his belt the scalps of three of its principal officers, including its Secretary of the Treasury, to gratify the ambition of one of its district attorneys, who wants to run for Congress on the opposition ticket, and has already driven his republican opponent from the track.

But what shall we say of a republican majority of a Committee on Ways and Means who shall allow themselves to be made the tools of an opposition member, to find him ammunition with which to wound, if not kill, their own Administration, if the only inducement to what they did was being blindly led by the superior wiliness of their democratic associate? But was that the mainspring of action on the part of all the republican members of the committee? Fourteen days after, to wit, the 20th of February, a letter was sent by the gentleman from Ohio, who reported the abrogation of the Sanborn contracts from the Committee on Ways and Means, to Supervisor Harmon, of Brooklyn, New York, the substance of which was sent to me under the heading "Copy of a letter picked up in the streets of Brooklyn, New York," which is as follows:

As a member of the Committee on Ways and Means he [FOSTER] had discovered the existence of the Sanborn contracts. At the same time he learned that indictments had been found in Brooklyn; that he prepared and offered the resolution calling on the Secretary for information; that he offered the resolution and General BUTLER objected to it. After this BUTLER came to him and asked him to offer the resolution again before the following Monday, expecting BUTLER to make a speech on it. In the meanwhile he [FOSTER] and General WOODFORD had agreed to reply to such speech if made and attack BUTLER; but General BUTLER withdrew his objection and said he hoped the House would pass the resolution, which surprised him and WOODFORD, especially himself, "as he had prepared himself to rap old Cock-eye."

Here you have the substance of a genuine letter which the gentleman from Ohio will not deny, especially the last phrase, because I told him one day that whatever he might say of me behind my back I wished he would not write of me that way, and I do not believe he will again.

Now, what could the gentleman from Ohio desire to "rap old Cock-eye" for? What had he done to the gentleman from Ohio? Had he ever interfered with him? Had he ever said an unkind word to him, or of or concerning him? I aver, from an intimate knowledge of that unfortunate individual with the defect in his eye, so delicately alluded to, that he had never entertained for that gentleman any but the kindest feeling. What personal grief he had, alas! I know not. From the time I got that letter I was utterly puzzled to know my imputed offense; but I got certain information, Mr. Speaker, afterward, embodied in the sworn testimony voluntarily sent me by the affiant, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

CITY OF WASHINGTON, District of Columbia:

WARWICK MARTIN, of the city of New York, being first duly sworn, on oath deposes and says:

Being acquainted with some of the claims embraced in the so-called Sanborn contracts, I, after the investigation commenced in the Committee on Ways and Means, addressed Hon. HENRY L. DAWES and Hon. FERNANDO WOOD, of said committee, requesting to be summoned to testify in said case. I was not summoned; but having business in Washington, I came here on the 9th of April, 1874, and concluded to appear before said committee and testify, if permitted so to do. I stopped at the Ebbitt House, and there saw Mr. DAWES and informed him of my wish to appear before the committee. He said I should be permitted to so testify. Afterward on the same day, at the committee-room, Mr. DAWES notified me to be present in said room on the following morning at ten o'clock. I was in said room promptly at the time named. On my arrival at said room only one gentleman of the committee was present, whom I learned to be Hon. CHARLES FOSTER. Another gentleman whom I did not know, but who I supposed was a member of the committee, came into said room soon after my arrival, and he and Mr. FOSTER commenced conversation.

Mr. FOSTER said to him, in language which I distinctly heard, that his object with which he commenced this investigation, or one object, was to find something against BEN. BUTLER; that said BUTLER had written a letter to his district to defeat his election, and he wished to get even with him, or words to that effect.

On the following day, the 11th of April, Mr. FOSTER came up and spoke to me at the Ebbitt House, where we were both stopping. He and I had a short conversation, during which the name of General BUTLER was mentioned, I having, as I now remember, stated that the committee seemed to be investigating General BUTLER instead of the law of May 8, 1872, and the contracts thereunder. Mr. FOSTER stated in reply, "Damn BUTLER; he ought to be investigated; all the men connected with these contracts are BUTLER'S friends, and you are his friend also, and saw him last night, and told him what I said in the committee-room yesterday about him," or words to this effect. I then stated to Mr. FOSTER that he was mistaken; that I had never enjoyed the pleasure of an introduction to, or an acquaintance with, General BUTLER; that I had not seen him on the evening named, or at any other time, to converse with him. I add that this is true still. I have never been unfriendly to General BUTLER, but have admired him for many things, and especially for the fact that he has always been in favor of compelling wealthy men, capitalists, and corporations to pay what they owe the Government, instead of taxing the poor, the industrious, and the honest farmers, mechanics, and laboring men to make good the deficiencies of the rich.

I so stated to Mr. FOSTER, and added that I thought this one question was all there was in the so-called Sanborn case.

WARWICK MARTIN.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 20th day of May, A. D. 1874.
[SEAL.]
H. W. BRELSFORD,
Notary Public, District of Columbia.

Mr. FOSTER. In so far as that affidavit makes the charge that I wanted to investigate General BUTLER, I pronounce it here and now an unequivocal falsehood. The party who makes it I know is perfectly characterless, and the gentleman from Massachusetts ought to know that, too. He is the man, as the gentleman from Massachusetts knows, who attempted to blackmail his friend Sanborn out of several thousand dollars.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I never knew Mr. Martin; I never saw him. I never boarded with him at the Ebbitt House, and he never was in my confidence.

Mr. FOSTER. He came to us in order to get more money out of Mr. Sanborn.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Now, I want to deny here most positively that I ever interfered in the gentleman's district in Ohio in my life. Indeed, I do not know where exactly his district is, save that it is somewhere in that great State. I take shame to myself that I do not know it. I ought to have known it. I know something about it now and its Representative; but that has nothing to do with the present question, because I aver, again and again, that I never did send out there to interfere with the gentleman from Ohio, and if he had called upon me he would have learned that I never did; and if he has any evidence that I ever sent out to his district in any way, prior to the time that he wrote that letter to Brooklyn, let him now produce and declare it. I wait for it. Being so thoroughly convinced that I had never given him any cause for complaint, I have no complaint to make or unkind word for him. He has been acting under entire misapprehension of fact and with a belief that I had done him a wrong. When he learns as he now does his mistake, his own sense of justice will correct it.

I could not believe even the affidavit until I turned to this very voluminous report, containing, with the testimony, three hundred and twenty-two pages, and upon examination found no allusion whatever to my humble self or eyes in the report of the committee upon the Sanborn contracts by any designation whatever; so that I am sure it turned out that I had nothing to do with them whatever, because the gentleman from Ohio in the examination of witnesses alluded to me in various forms of questions thirty-three times, and each time he got the answer that the witness did not know that I did anything, or knew anything, or said anything on the subject of the Sanborn contracts. Still, every time he alluded to me the New York Tribune published a statement that General BUTLER'S name appeared everywhere in the investigation; and this statement was copied each day into all the Boston papers which are under the control of some of my colleagues from Massachusetts, who were endeavoring to convince the people that I was engaged in the affair. Nay, my colleagues' newspapers were so put to it for evidence of the fact that they declared that Sanborn's lawyer, Mr. Prescott, was my private secretary and henchman, whatever that may be, and cited as proof that he had his office with me, when I am told that he once had an office in a four-story building where I have mine, with some twenty other tenants. Let me say that I never saw Prescott three times in my life, and did not know him by sight till he was sent for as a witness. Besides that, when the gentleman made his speech he alluded to me twenty-eight times, making sixty-one in all; and then, after his sixty-one questions and personal allusions in the examination and in the speech, the editor of the Tribune thought that my "coat-tails" could be seen in the affair. And this is the kind of attack to which men in public life are exposed from investigations when somebody wants to get even with them.

Now, I have no objection to being investigated by anybody and everybody, friends or enemies; for the more the latter investigate me the worse they will like me. But I do object to the public money being spent for that purpose under the direction of the Committee on Ways and Means when they ought to have been perfecting a finance measure, so that the two-thirds republican majority of this House should not now hang their heads with shame that this Congress has to go home after more than six months' session and no comprehensive financial or revenue measure perfected and passed, or any ever come from that committee on which the House may pass. But, on the contrary, they have been engaged in vilifying the Administration, rapping "old Cock-eye," and getting even with him, even to examining into his private affairs, the fees he received from private persons, and his personal acts to the number of thirty-three questions. And thus having learned how unjust and improper it is for anybody even, anywhere, to examine into another's private affairs, the committee reported a bill that a man's books and papers ought not to be used or his private affairs inquired into without an order of a court upon a complaint under oath. Why was not this committee legislating about the drooping business and unemployed labor of the country and trying to find a remedy for that?

How will they answer to their constituents, nay, how will this committee answer to the country, that they frittered away their time in this pursuit of personal revenge, and have done nothing with either finance or revenue except to pass two bills; one of which, if you look back at the tables I have presented, cuts off $1,200,000 of money paid into the Treasury last year, and the other the best-informed man upon the subject swears will prevent the collection of at least four millions of taxes more, all of which should come from those who have tried and are trying to cheat the United States?

Is it wonderful that the interests of the republican party and the interests of the country have been neglected while the Committee on Ways and Means, under the leadership of the gentleman from Kentucky, endeavors to break down the Administration, as he had a right to do, and under the lead of the gentleman from Ohio, mistakenly thinking he had a private grief against me to assuage, have frittered the time of Congress away for more than six months in striking at one of their fellow-members who had not injured them, and against whom, although pursued with the hate of hell, they found nothing and reported nothing after six months of investigation. No, thank God; as usual, "old Cock-eye escaped without a rap."

I do not desire the House or the country to blame either of the gentlemen of the Committee on Ways and Means too much in this matter, because there were those in this House who were egging them on, advising them to do it. Nay, there were those of my colleagues from Massachusetts who, in order to strike at me, were willing to strike down the republican party. The speech of the gentleman from Kentucky against the Administration, founded upon "bringing the Sanborn matter to the front," a very able, bitter, denunciatory arraignment of that Administration, put with all the power he could, and quite worthy of the successor of Clay in the Louisville district, was launched at our party like a thunderbolt. I expected and supposed, and the House expected, that his democratic associates would circulate it everywhere to break down the republican party, even at the cost of paying the postage on the distribution.

But what shall we say of republican Representatives who subscribed for and circulate such a speech by the thousand—a speech of the leading orator of the other side by the thousand? Why, Mr. Speaker, the State of Massachusetts has more of the Kentucky speeches circulated in it by one of my colleagues than of any republican speech made in this House during the present session. And why? Having circulated everywhere through their lying newspapers that I was connected with the Sanborn contract, it was thought by some of my colleagues that the arraignment of the gentleman from Kentucky of the Administration would be an indirect "rap at old Cock-eye;" and as my enemies either could not or dare not make any speech against that long-suffering individual themselves, they chose to send out this attack upon their Administration, thus to belittle their Secretary of the Treasury from their own State, to be the means of circulating the charges of corruption against their party, in order to get an indirect "rap" at one of their colleagues.

Now, I call upon the gentleman from Ohio to deny, if he can, that more than one of my colleagues have been to him to give him information about me and to have questions put about me, and to advise with him as to the course that might be taken in his committee to investigate me. Sir, was that so or not? Will the gentleman answer upon his honor?

Mr. FOSTER. Do you wish an answer now?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes, sir.

Mr. FOSTER. I have to say that I have had no consultation with any gentleman from Massachusetts in relation to the Sanborn investigation; none of them have aided or advised me in any way in the prosecution of this investigation.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am glad to hear it.

Mr. FOSTER. Or in the investigation of the matter at all.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Only about other things?

Mr. FOSTER. No; about nothing else.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Whenever I want a witness to tell what is not true I shall not send for my friend from Ohio.

Mr. FOSTER. What do you mean by that?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I mean that you tell the truth exactly.

Does the House wonder now that almost the only man who was found to object to my addressing the House at this hour was one of my colleagues from Massachusetts?

Mr. Speaker, I have done my duty to this matter. I have shown by such evidence as has come to me, and by the facts, what was the ground-work, in fact, of this investigation and this cry raised against the republican party because of the Sanborn contracts. There is not a man within the sound of my voice that now does not understand it.

Mr. Speaker, more than one-half at least of all the investigations carried on in Congress are for the purpose of striking down some rival, or injuring some enemy, or injuring some administrative officer, or gaining some party end, not for the purpose of aiding legislation. This business of investigation is carried too far. I can speak plainly in the face of the country; for myself I defy investigation. For fourteen years, since the commencement of my public life, I have lived under the focus of a microscope, magnifying and distorting every action of mine a million times, except, perchance, it was a good one, which it blurred and covered altogether. Living under such inspection, therefore, whether I would or no, I must lead an honest and upright life, or some man would in all these years have got a "rap at old Cock-eye," and I propose to take very good care of him now and ever. I desire investigation. I look forward to the time when the majority of this House will be opposed in politics to mine; and then I ask them to investigate every act of mine and publish its results to the country. I invoke the investigation of a gentlemanly political opposition, and not of a malignant personal spleen and spite, egged on by political rivalry; because I humbly trust that when my every act is known and understood authoritatively and exactly in its breadth and in its motives the kindly judgment of my countrymen will be, after all rivalry and unkindness of thought has passed away, "He was a man whose virtues overbalanced his faults, who loved his country, his kind, justice, and nobleness."

Mr. FOSTER. Let us pray.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes; but spell it with an "e."

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS, Mr. Speaker, after laws are passed it is not usual to discuss them. It has remained for the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] to wait until both Houses of Congress have acted upon the bill which he assails to come in and make his argument against it. It is not because he was not invited that he did not appear upon the discussion of the moiety bill; it was not because he did not have the opportunity to appear that he did not discuss the Sanborn contracts, when the bill in relation to those contracts was pending in the House. It fell to me to have charge of the bill to amend the customs laws and to repeal moieties, and three times, Mr. Speaker, as you personally know, the consideration of that bill was postponed to enable the gentleman from Massachusetts to appear and be heard upon it. He states that it was understood by the country that he was ill when the bill was passed. The ante-room at my back resounded with the stories he was telling and the arguments he was making there against the bill. Not here before Congress, not here before the country, but back there in the cloak-room he chose to come and make his arguments. Sir, I do not object to his arguments now or at any time, here or elsewhere.

EXPERIENCE AND AUTHORITY.

He chose to refer to the British revenue system. He tells you that we referred in our discussion to the British revenue system as justifying the bill which Congress passed with entire unanimity in this House, and with but three dissenting votes in the other House, and upon the conference report without one dissenting voice in either House.

But the British system, Mr. Speaker, is not our only authority, and yet we might rely upon it. The gentleman chose to say that our tariff was complex. It is; but our internal-revenue system is complex now, and was much more complex when Congress with great unanimity repealed the moiety system with reference to the internal revenue. Our internal-revenue system justifies that act of Congress as British experience justifies the policy which we have adopted. More than that. It has received the approval of the republican party in great States, for republican members of this House will bear in mind that in the platform of the republican party of Indiana adopted only two or three days ago there is a declaration commendatory of the abolition of moieties and the abolition of the Sanborn contracts.

But the gentleman from Massachusetts tells you that the moiety system has been sustained by every Administration since the foundation of the Government. It is true that it is an old system. In olden times it was customary to hang a man who stole a sheep. It was not found by experience that that was a wise provision of law, nor has it been found wise to maintain a like barbarism upon our statute-books in any regard.

But, Mr. Speaker, we have authority, if it is authority which the gentleman from Massachusetts pleads, for the action which Congress has taken. The gentleman has chosen to say that past Administrations have sustained the moiety system. This Administration has demanded its repeal. In the first message of President Grant in 1869 he expressly recommended the repeal of moieties. Secretary BOUTWELL very elaborately argued in favor of the abolition of the moiety system, and, sir, Mr. BOUTWELL voted in the Senate for this very bill which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] now denounces. In 1871 President Grant again recommended with great earnestness the repeal of the moiety system, and Secretary BOUTWELL repeated his arguments to that end, and that Secretary of the Treasury for whom the gentleman from Massachusetts seems to have so much sympathy, Mr. Richardson, the late Secretary of the Treasury, also recommended the abolition of moieties.

Let me call attention to their exact words, although I have once before done so when the subject was regularly before the House.

In his message of 1869 President Grant said:

Your attention is respectfully invited to the recommendations of the Secretary of the Treasury for the creation of the office of Commissioner of Customs Revenue; * * * and most especially to his recommendation for the repeal of laws allowing shares of fines, penalties, forfeitures, &c., to officers of the Government or to informers.

In the same year Secretary BOUTWELL said:

Under existing laws, certain revenue officers and other persons appearing as informers are entitled to shares in fines, penalties, and forfeitures. During the fiscal year 1868–'69 the Treasury Department distributed the sum of $286,073.61 to such officers and to informers in the various cases arising under the customs-revenue laws. A large additional sum was also paid through the Internal Revenue office. The reason on which the laws granting such allowances are based is that officers of the Government are stimulated to greater activity in the discovery of frauds and in bringing offenders to punishment. There can be no doubt that such is the effect of the policy; but the experience I have had in the Treasury Department has convinced me that the evils attending the system are greater than the benefits derived from it. It often occurs that revenue officers are led to assert claims in behalf of the Government which have no just foundation in law or in the facts of the respective cases; and where real claims exist it is often the object of the informers and officers who share in the penalties to misrepresent the case to the Department, so as to secure the greatest advantage to themselves. But a more serious evil is found in the practice, quite general, of allowing persons to pursue a fraudulent course until a result is reached which will inure to the benefit of the officers and informers, instead of checking criminal practices at the outset. It is impossible to set forth in exact language the character of the evils that grow out of the present system. I am, however, clearly of the opinion that the Government ought to rely upon public officers for the proper performance of their duties without stimulating them by any contingent advantages.

In 1871, again, President Grant said in his annual message:

The present laws for collecting revenue pay collectors of customs small salaries, but provide for moieties (shares in all seizures) which, at principal ports of entry particularly, raise the compensation of those officials to a large sum. It has always seemed to me as if this system must at times work perniciously. It holds out an inducement to dishonest men, should such get possession of those offices, to be lax in their scrutiny of goods entered to enable them finally to make large seizures. Your attention is respectfully invited to this subject.

Secretary BOUTWELL repeated his previous recommendations in these words:

It is my duty to call the attention of Congress to the importance of abolishing the system of shares in moieties as far as the benefits inure to revenue officers and other persons officially connected with the Government. This measure was recommended in my last annual report, and a statement was submitted to Congress showing the amount received by officers of customs, together with the bill increasing their salaries without any increase of appropriations from the Treasury; the sum now paid from moieties being quite sufficient to place the entire force upon a satisfactory footing in regard to pay.

During the last fiscal year the offices of collector and surveyor of the port of New York each received from moieties the sum of $49,215.69, and the naval officer the sum of $48,195.59.

In most of the cases the officers do not perform special services entitling them to the amounts granted, and importers and others whose acts are made the subject of investigation complain, and I think with just reason, that the agents of the Government have a pecuniary interest in pursuing those charged with violations of the law. The Government ought to pay fair salaries, and rely upon the good faith of its officers for the performance of their duty. One of the difficulties which the Department has to meet frequently is, that customs officers have an interest in proceedings for the discovery of fraud, the settlement of cases, or the prosecution of them, which is different from the real interest of the Government; and, as a necessary result, the conduct of such officers is open to suspicion, both on the part of those who are pursued by them and the Government that they ostensibly represent.

It may be deemed expedient to leave the law as it now stands in regard to informers who are not officers, making it a penal offense for any officer to enter into an arrangement with an informer for any share of the proceeds of the information, and giving to the informer perpetual right of action for the recovery of any money or other valuable thing paid or given to an officer engaged in the discovery or prosecution of a fraud or legal wrong against the Government.

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue testified as follows in the Sanborn investigation, (page 96, Report 559:)

Question. Congress repealed all the moiety system as far as internal revenue was concerned?

Answer. Yes.

Q. How long was that before the passage of the act which authorized the Sanborn contract?

A. Not long; but I cannot give you the exact time.

Q. Had the moiety system, up to the time of this repeal, been of such character as to recommend its continuance to you? Were you in favor of its repeal when it was repealed?

A. I was in favor of its repeal, with this other provision, if I could have some means afterward of compensating persons who gave information, and for that a special appropriation of $100,000 was made. My objection was that, before that, officers and all had moiety alike, and that gave to the officers the appearance of hunters for prey rather than of officers doing their duty.

Q. What was the effect of the moiety system that was repealed by Congress on the service?

A. It hurt the service, I think, in this way: the officer getting his share the same as a private individual, when he went to the citizen, the citizen always claimed that the officer came to him to make money out of him rather than to discharge his official duty, and in that way it seemed to degrade his official acts. That was the objection.

Mr. Richardson, as Secretary of the Treasury, in an elaborate letter to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Commerce, argued the subject at length, and recommended "the abolition of the present system of moieties with one exception, to wit, where attempts at smuggling are detected or where the act of smuggling is accomplished." This is precisely what you have done by your legislation.

If, then, this is to be settled by authority, we find the President of the United States, both of his Secretaries of the Treasury, and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, on the same side with Congress and the republican party, and on the other side the gentleman from the Essex district of Massachusetts.

LOSSES UNDER THE MOIETY SYSTEM.

But the gentleman from Massachusetts comes here to teach us that we should have a specific and not an ad valorem tariff. Perhaps that is so. But that is not the question before us to-night; and it was not the question pending before this House when the bills were passed which he now assails. The gentleman tells us that under this ad valorem system we collect but 67 per cent. of the duties, not without the moieties but with the moieties, not without this machinery of barbarism but with this machinery of barbarism. With your inducements to officers to suffer violations of the law to go on for years to mass large penalties for division; with your arbitrary invasion of the office and of correspondence; with your severities arraying public sentiment against you so that juries refuse to be the instruments of your laws; with commerce protesting against your statutes and their enforcement, it is not strange that we can collect but 67 per cent. of our duties.

If we cannot do any better than that with this system of barbarism, I ask my colleagues about me if it is not high time to try some better system? We mean to collect more than 67 per cent. That is why we have asked Congress to reform the revenue laws; that is why you have abolished moieties; why you have adjusted the use of books and papers as evidence to the rule of every one of our States and to the practice of our fathers; that is why you strike down the extreme measures adopted during the war; that is why you appeal to the mercantile community to assist in sustaining just laws. You have made no mistake in so doing. And even the gentleman from Massachusetts did not appear to obstruct your beneficent action.

PHELPS, DODGE & CO.

But he does come here to tell us something about the case of Phelps, Dodge & Co. Mr. Speaker, we are not trying the case of Phelps, Dodge & Co. If we were, then the remarkable qualities of the gentleman from Massachusetts as a criminal lawyer might well be brought into play, and counsel ought also to be present on the other side. We are here to consider legislation, not to assail citizens who are reputable, who were reputable before the gentleman from Massachusetts came into the Congress of the United States, and who will be reputable after the gentleman from Massachusetts leaves this body.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. To what citizens do you refer?

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I refer to the house of Phelps, Dodge & Co.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. O, yes; that is all right.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. And I refer to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I heard that.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. And I ask, because I do not know so much as the gentleman from Massachusetts about the case of Phelps, Dodge & Co.——

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That is evident.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I do not know so much as the gentleman from Massachusetts of one side of that case. To show why he is better informed about it than I can be, I ask that the evidence of the informer with reference to the connection of the gentleman from Massachusetts with the case of Phelps, Dodge & Co. may be read.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am very much obliged to you for that.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. It will be found on page 173 of the evidence.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will you allow me to reply after it is read?

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. No, sir.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I thought so.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. You declined to let me come in.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Never.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. You have had your day in court.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I only declined to have you interrupt me, not to have you come in and reply.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. FOSTER. I did not exactly understand the answer to Mr. ROBERTS's question. You employed counsel for what?

Mr. JAYNE. I deemed that it was a case where some ugly points might arise, and where this matter might come up; that it probably would come up in the course of some discussion growing out of this case. I did consent and urge settlement of this case for a sum of money that the counsel for the informer was not willing should be accepted. I deemed that some ugly proceedings might, perhaps, grow out of this attempt to black-mail. I thought the truth might come out and I might need counsel. I came with the facts to the Secretary of the Treasury, and to counsel whom I employed.

Mr. FOSTER. Then I am to understand that you employed counsel to prevent a larger sum being paid by Phelps, Dodge & Co.?

Mr. JAYNE. I employed counsel to secure the settlement upon the terms that they offered and seemed anxious to close upon.

Mr. FOSTER. And not to have them pay a larger sum?

Mr. JAYNE. Not to have them pay a larger sum.

Mr. FOSTER. I think it would be well for your to give the name of the counsel, for we have understood that he was employed for a different purpose.

Mr. JAYNE. General BUTLER was the gentleman, sir. He was not employed for a different purpose.

Mr. FOSTER. Has he been employed in any other cases with you?

Mr. JAYNE. Whenever I had questions of law that I did not understand—and in the course of my experience I have had a great many questions of law and of evidence arising—I have submitted a number of questions to General BUTLER, and I have paid him, I think, $1,500 besides what I paid in that case.

Mr. FOSTER. How many cases has he been employed in?

Mr. JAYNE. I could not tell the exact number that I have asked him questions with regard to. I should think two or three, or three or four, perhaps.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. That is all I ask to have read at this time. That will show why the gentleman from Massachusetts knows more about that case, or may claim to know more about one side of it, than I do. Perhaps it is a part of the task which he has undertaken, for the fee mentioned in that evidence, to assail a reputable mercantile house upon the floor of the American Congress.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. The floor is mine, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes, you are as brave as a country editor generally is.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. Brave! I have asked you three times to come into this House and debate this question, and you had not the courage to come.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Not when I was sick.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. The floor is mine, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. You asked a sick man to come; you are very brave. He is well now, and you will not hear him.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS:

> I did hear him groan:
> Ay, and that tongue of his, * * *
> * * * * *
> Alas! it cried, "Give me some drink, Titinius,"
> As a sick girl.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes, I am like Cæsar.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. Yes; "As a sick girl."

SEIZURE OF BOOKS AND PAPERS.

Let me call particular attention to the very significant fact that even the gentleman from Massachusetts has not one word to say in favor of the system of the seizure of books and papers. You have substantially wiped it out. That is one of the chief features of the bill which you have passed. Against that reform criticism is dumb.

WHY JUST ONE-HALF?

The gentleman from Massachusetts contents himself with warning us against the consequences of the repeal of moieties. When was it ever discovered that exactly one-half was the proper sum with which to induce lawyers and others to steal papers, or to have them "picked up on the street," to bribe the clerks of merchant houses, and to surround the commerce of this country with an infamous band? Why is it just one-half? Why not a little more than one-half, so that larger fees could be paid for counsel to appear not only at the Treasury but upon the floor of this House? Why not more than one-half? Why not a little less?

You, my colleagues, have chosen to say that for smuggling you will pay one-half for the detection of the crime; but for other offenses against the revenue you will pay—how much? A bagatelle, is it? For the detection of any offense against the revenue committed by importers or by officers of the revenue you will pay as much as you pay for a year's work, not simply to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, with his experience of eighteen years in this House, his ability, and industry and fidelity; but you will pay for the detection of every crime against the revenue, as much even as the American people pay to their chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary of this House, [Mr. BUTLER.] Is not that quite enough—a year's salary of the best talent in the country employed in the cares and responsibility of legislation for any detective who will bring to light one single offense against the revenue? The price of a farm, of a homestead, to a detective for a single case—is not that enough? Do you want to keep up a system for pouring money into States to control guberna torial nominations? Even with all that flood of money gubernatorial nominations are not always secured.

FINES AND PENALTIES NOT REPEALED.

But the gentleman from Massachusetts appeals to the country against Congress as if we had repealed fines, penalties, and forfeitures. The gentleman from Massachusetts could not have intended to create that impression, because it is not true. You have not repealed fines, penalties, and forfeitures. We have sought to make them more definite; we have sought to make collection dependent not upon informers, not even upon the pleasure of the Secretary of the Treasury, or any district attorney. But we have sought to make your law clear and to render its execution certain as the fiat of fate.

THE UNANIMOUS VOTE.

But, Mr. Speaker, it is a work of supererogation to talk here in favor of a bill which received the unanimous vote in this House from every State; which in the other branch of Congress had but three negative votes, and finally upon the conference report was unanimously adopted.

Mr. DAWES. After full discussion.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. Yes; after long and full discussion in the other House, and after a discussion in this House which was exhaustive in every respect except in not having represented in it the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.]

THE SANBORN CONTRACTS.

After the arguments when the bill for their repeal was pending, and after what has been so forcibly said by my distinguished colleague on the Committee on Ways and Means, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FOSTER,] it is not necessary for me to refer again to the cognate subject—the Sanborn contracts. I did not suppose that there was in this land one man who would dare to defend them in their enormity. Even John D. Sanborn, when he came before the Ways and Means Committee, admitted that the rate allowed to him for collection was exorbitant, and that he would be willing to continue the collection at a less rate.

Mr. KASSON. At 15 per cent.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. My colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] says Sanborn was willing to collect the taxes for 15 per cent. instead of 50 per cent. The Committee on Ways and Means preferred what they considered a still better system, that the taxes should be collected by the sworn officers of the Government as they have been collected steadily all the while, in spite of the work of Sanborn. I take the liberty of submitting as part of my remarks tables showing the amount of taxes actually collected by your Internal Revenue Bureau, even during the progress of the Sanborn contracts. They are as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE,

H. C. ROGERS,

REGULAR COLLECTIONS vs. SANBORN.

Observe that even the Sanborn contracts have not prevented the department from gathering in by regular means large sums of money from such taxes. Besides the collections actually made by the regular officers for him, besides the cases under indictment and in process of settlement, on which Sanborn received moieties, the official records show that these millions have been collected without paying toll to him.

In the last fiscal year the internal revenue was collected for about 5 per cent. and the customs for about 4 per cent. Sanborn was allowed 50 per cent., yet his cupidity has snatched from the direct course of collection not one-tenth of the actual proceeds of repealed taxes.

He collected nothing from distillery cases, except from one person under indictment. From legacies and successions he picked up nothing except in a single city. From mammoth corporations he took little, if anything, besides what was on its way to the Treasury. His own witnesses show that he rendered no service. John D. Coughlin swears that for 12½ per cent. he collected the legacy taxes in New York for Sanborn, and would have done the same without his intervention. (See evidence, page 9.) The testimony of Presbrey, (page 82,) of Green, (page 66,) of Odell, (page 220,) and of Hawley, (page 227,) agrees in showing Sanborn only as the claimant for the moiety. In few instances is it shown that he collected anything which the Department could not by its regular methods reach and gather in.

No pretext of necessity, no allegation of neglect on the part of the Bureau, no exaggeration of the saving of money to the Treasury, can be supported by the facts to serve as an excuse or even a palliation of the contracts and the abuses which Congress has now ended forever.

The statute of 1872 was not in its terms mandatory. By it a practice which had existed was legalized and restricted. The Secretary of the Treasury might well feel bound to act under it. That, then, is the responsibility of Congress. The door was thus opened to abuses. They were not actually introduced. They were invited. They flocked in like doves to the window.

Only by abuses could this contract system prove a source of wealth to the contractor. No individual could have the resources of the Government for pressing collections. Internal-revenue taxes lie within a narrow field in which close scrutiny can be exercised. The chances for actual "discovery" of such taxes withheld must in the nature of the case be few. Only by abandoning or breaking down the restrictions of the statute could the spoils grow to a corrupt and dangerous magnitude. That was permitted to the contractor.

THE REAL CRIME.

He claimed "discovery" of every tax under repealed laws, whether he found it in court, in the hands of internal-revenue officers, or actually credited to the Government. Broader yet was the field in which he assumed mastery. Into his contract he thrust the names of persons and corporations, swearing that they were "indebted to the Government upon taxes withheld," although he had no knowledge whatever on the subject, and simply copied them from surrogates' records and railway guides. (See his evidence, pages 152, 158.)

AN EXCEPTION.

The indignation which has been aroused by the exposures reported by the Committee on Ways and Means proves that this contract system is an exception, a monstrosity in our administration. It is in antagonism to our institutions, and especially to the spirit of recent legislation. You find farming the revenue prevail in semi-barbarous China and in Turkey. The most despotic of the French monarchs thus enriched their favorites, male and female. Britain has never accorded welcome to the policy. With us it has been an exotic parasite, of sickly growth.

REPEAL IMPERATIVE.

The repeal of any law that tolerated such a system was imperatively demanded.

The Committee on Ways and Means, Mr. Speaker, have had simply the work of carrying out what was obviously the wish of the House, and what beyond all question is the wish of the country. Whether or not it be true that the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] my colleague on the committee, had his attention first called to this matter or not I do not know, because the letter read here to-night is the first suggestion I have ever heard that he originated this movement. When this Congress assembled the notoriety of the cases in Brooklyn attracted the attention of other members of the committee.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Is the gentleman quite certain of that?

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I am.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Congress came together in December, and the Brooklyn matter did not come out until long after.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I know what I am talking about. The first indictment was found in November or December.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No, sir.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. Well; it is certain that before the resolution was introduced by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] he talked with a number of members of the committee, I think I may say; but without speaking of anybody else I know he talked to me about the form of his resolution. He introduced that resolution. And the Committee on Ways and Means would have been content with the simple repeal of the law. But it was the gentleman from the Essex district of Massachusetts who demanded that his friend, Mr. John D. Sanborn, should have a hearing, Sanborn having previously made such a request to some members of the committee. It was by a republican member of the House that this resolution was introduced, as a proper step toward the reform of a flagrant evil.

REVENUE MEASURES.

But the gentleman from Massachusetts chooses to introduce just here an indictment of the Ways and Means Committee for not bringing in a revenue measure.

Mr. Speaker, the Ways and Means Committee have been studying the revenue question all through this Congress, and they have not brought in a bill to increase the taxes, because in their judgment it was not right, it was not proper; the exigencies of the country did not demand that taxes should be increased. And the Ways and Means Committee are quite ready to go to the country upon that record; that when industry is paralyzed, when commerce folds its hands in idleness, when thousands of our people know not whither to turn for their day's labor, the Committee on Ways and Means have declined to put new burdens on the country.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Did not the gentleman's committee bring in a bill to increase the tax on friction matches?

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. No, sir; we refused to repeal the tax on friction matches.

Mr. KASSON. We reported the bill adversely.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. It was a bill to repeal taxes on friction matches, and we reported it adversely. This only illustrates how very little the gentleman from the Essex district of Massachusetts knows about the question which he has assumed to discuss.

Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand the justification of the action of the Committee on Ways and Means in declining to increase taxes. The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] the chairman of the committee, early in this session made a long argument in some parts of which I could not agree, but the conclusion of which was that no taxes were necessary. I had the honor to submit some remarks also leading in the same direction. It was my fortune early in the session to make an estimate about the revenue for the present fiscal year. I ventured as early as the 2d of March to say that the revenues for this fiscal year would be $288,000,000, although the Treasury, with the abundant caution which is proper for it, placed them at about the same time at $281,000,000. You will find the table of the Treasury in the RECORD for March 3, cited in my remarks. The estimate was for total income for the year ending June 30, 1874, $281,777,972.19; expenditures, including sinking fund, $321,477,616.35; cash in Treasury July 1, 1874, $20,302,385.14.

The figures which I then submitted were for receipts, $288,000,000; expenditures, including sinking fund, $314,191,369.28; cash in Treasury, $35,000,000.

Now the warrant division of the Treasury, estimating for the few days remaining, gives the receipts for the fiscal year at over $290,000,000; the expenditures at $316,843,349; and the cash in the Treasury July 1, at $33,194,333. Here are the figures in detail:

Cash in the Treasury July 1, 1873			$131,192,028 50
From which deduct sums on deposit by provisions of law, represented in this amount, as follows:
Special deposits of legal-tenders held for redemption of certificates of deposit	$31,730,000 00
Coin deposits for which coin certificates were outstanding	39,460,000 00
		71,190,000 00
Total available cash belonging to the Government			$60,002,028 50
Receipts from July 1, 1873, to February 1, 1874, (five days estimated)			165,677,972 99
Receipts from February 1 to June 30, 1874, (twenty days estimated,) namely:
Customs:
February	$14,434,659 77
March	15,147,033 57
Unascertained and not reported at close of monthly account	506,664 35
April	13,856,488 95
May	12,418,062 15
June, (part estimated)	13,000,000 00
		69,362,908 79
Internal revenue:
February	8,134,408 79
March	7,493,792 94

June, (part estimated)	8,500,000 00
		$43,751,757 78
Miscellaneous:
February	3,488,931 00
March	2,044,981 94
April	2,308,949 64
May	1,800,152 94
June, (part estimated)	1,600,000 00
		$124,357,682 09
Total ordinary revenues			$290,035,655 08
Total available resources			350,037,683 58
Ordinary expenditures on account of appropriations:
From July 1, 1873, to February 1, 1874, (five days estimated)		177,174,585 59
From February 1, 1874, to June 30, 1874, (twenty days estimated)		110,477,394 81
Total ordinary expenditures		287,651,980 40
Liabilities on account of sinking fund		29,191,369 28

It will be seen from the foregoing statement that the income of the Government for the current fiscal year is estimated at $2,383,674.68 in excess of the expenditures. This will leave $26,807,686.60 of the sinking fund unprovided for.

Monthly statement of receipts for the year, adjusted to March 31, 1874.

Although the estimates submitted by me nearly four months ago were then pronounced as oversanguine by some gentlemen on this floor and in the press, the result has more than justified them. The receipts overrun those estimates by more than $2,000,000, and probably by even more. While the Treasury estimate of expenditures still exceeds the figures submitted by me, the actual result will be found to be between them, and the net cash in the Treasury will vary little if any from $35,000,000. So that setting out of the account for the moment the issue of $26,000,000 of legal-tenders taken from the reserve, we shall have from three to five million dollars of net surplus for the fiscal year to apply upon the sinking fund, while for the next year we may confidently expect under the laws as we now have them a complete adjustment of the sinking fund for both years. That is the justification of the Committee on Ways and Means for not bringing in a bill to increase taxes. Our judgment was that it was not necessary; and we know no reason why it should be counted a luxury to burden the people without necessity.

ASSAILING THE ADMINISTRATION.

But the gentleman from Massachusetts charges as his last indictment that the Committee on Ways and Means have been assailing the Administration. How? By preventing a corruptionist holding the Treasury in his hands and controlling its officers. How? By repealing moieties recommended to be repealed by the President of the United States. How? By striking down the infamous Sanborn contracts. Why, Mr. Speaker, I have yet to learn that moieties are the administration of the United States. I have yet to learn that John D. Sanborn is the republican administration. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I have yet to learn that even the gentleman from the Essex district of Massachusetts, with all his ability, is the administration of the republican party—the administration of the United States. When I learn either fact it will be time enough for me to inquire my duty toward them as such, and then, if not now, I will not be afraid of the indictment of assailing the Administration, if it be assailing the Administration to strike down corruption wherever I see it, if it be assailing the Administration to strive for the right wherever it may lead.

Mr. Speaker, I have it in my heart and bones that the republican party is the party of conscience, the party of progress, and the party of right, and it is because I so believe that I have been a republican before the gentleman from Massachusetts was a republican, and I expect to be a republican after the gentleman from the Essex district of Massachusetts has made new party affiliations and gone to his own place.

It is because the moiety bill adjusts the revenue law to what I believe to be the modern ideas of humanity not only, but what seems to me to be the essential spirit of civilization, that in my humble way I have done what in me lay for the repeal of the system, and in doing that I have rendered the best service in my power to the republican administration, to the republican party, to honesty in legislation and administration, and therefore to my country and my God.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, after listening to the extraordinary speechjust made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] I find but little in it that calls upon me for a reply, save and except his personal allusions to me in connection with the Sanborn investigation, and I desire to say that so far as my personal action in these proceedings is concerned, it was solely in the line of discharging an official duty, and with no feeling of unkindness toward any one. I believed from the start that a monstrous robbery had been attempted and partly executed on the Treasury. I believed then, as I do now, that the law authorizing the Sanborn contracts was passed for the purpose of plunder by those who engineered its passage. I believed that more than one member of Congress had knowledge of the purposes for which it was to be used before it passed. If, therefore, in asking general questions about members of Congress in connection with these contracts, the answers to which should point in all manner of ways to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] it is not my fault. If he has had no connection with them, it is certainly unfortunate for him that so many of his friends should be mixed up with them.

I well knew that I would have to encounter such hostility as only the gentleman from Massachusetts can command. I knew that my letters, if possible, would be stolen; I knew that unprincipled men would be induced to make false affidavits; I knew that my past life would be investigated with the purpose to "break me down;" but I did not expect the secret service of the Government would be used to traverse my district trying to hunt up something for the gentleman to use against me. He has through the agency of one Hughes secured a copy of a letter of mine, which he has just read to the House, the contents of which he is welcome to. Let him make the best use he may of the phrase "old Cock-eye;" it is a generous, well-intended phrase, will wear well, and live as long as the gentleman from Massachusetts. He has come forward with an affidavit from a blackmailer of Sanborn, known to him as such, in which the false statement is made that I said to this man Martin "D—n BUTLER; he ought to be investigated." He has acknowledged that he has sent into my district to learn of something that he might use against me. His strikers have given out that I was to be scalped. Now, what does all this amount to? There is nothing in the letter of which any friend of mine need take exception except to smile at its truthfulness. There is nothing in the affidavit, (if true,) that reflects any discredit on me; and so little could his detectives find in my district, that he has not been able to come forward with any charge whatever.

On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, the investigation has been a complete success, a vindication of my labors on the sub-committee and of the work of the whole committee in the results they have reached; for the House have unanimously adopted the bills and reports. The law under which the Sanborn contracts were made is repealed, the contracts annulled, the officers of the Treasury Department directly and indirectly connected with this disgraceful transaction are removed, and are replaced with men in whom the country has the fullest confidence.

That I have led in an investigation that has resulted so successfully in every phase of the case is a matter in which I feel a just pride, and is one which I know the country appreciates. That the gentleman from Massachusetts has suffered in reputation is not my fault, but rather that of his associations. I am not surprised that he should feel so sore over it and that he has seen fit to make a personal attack upon me to-night. He has made his own bed of torture; let him lie in it. I cannot help it.

I am very glad, Mr. Speaker, of the opportunity of presenting to the House and to the country the facts in relation to that investigation; and I want to say here in the outset that the Committee on Ways and Means never ordered an investigation into the facts in that case to the extent of calling witnesses. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] and myself were appointed a sub-committee on the part of the Committee on Ways and Means to investigate the affairs of the Internal Revenue Office at the request of the Committee on Appropriations. During that investigation it came to our knowledge that the Treasury of the United States was being robbed in some way, just exactly how we did not know. I went alone to the officers of the Treasury Department, because the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] said to me that I had better go myself—that as he was a democrat it would be better for me to know the secrets of these things alone. I went to the office of the Solicitor of the Treasury, and also to the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, and my interview with those officers was so unsatisfactory that I came back to the House and offered a resolution of inquiry calling for copies of the contracts. After two or three weeks' delay that resolution was answered, giving copies of the contracts, but without the names of parties charged with having withheld their taxes. That answer was unsatisfactory to the House, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] offered a resolution broader in its terms, which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means. The Committee on Ways and Means directed me to report back to the House that resolution in still broader terms, calling for copies of the contracts and orders and everything in relation to the Sanborn contracts. In the course of time, in two or three weeks perhaps, we got an answer to this resolution. At the time I offered this second resolution the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] will remember that he objected to its introduction unless I would permit discussion, but finally he assented to a withdrawal of his objection, and the resolution was adopted by the House.

At that time the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOODFORD] asked the privilege of making a speech,and that was the speech referred to in the letter of mine read by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.] What he was going to say I knew not, but he asked the privilege and I granted it. Next day the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] said to me if I would offer the resolution he would withdraw his objection. Then in two or three weeks the Secretary's answer came to the House, and was ordered to be printed, and when printed the document came to the Committee on Ways and Means, and on examination the committee directed me to report a bill to the House to repeal the law.

Now, Mr. Speaker, but for the written request of Sanborn asking to be heard before we acted, and the personal application of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] that Sanborn's request be granted, that law would have been repealed and no investigation would have been instituted. About that time Mr. Sumner died, and this matter was postponed until the ceremonies attending his funeral were over. Sanborn appeared directly afterward with a host of witnesses, half a dozen or more. He brought Mr. Coughlin from New York, he brought Mr. Simmons from Boston, he brought old Belsterling from Philadelphia, and others—some from Washington and other points. They came on here and were going to convince (as the gentleman from Massachusetts said) the Committee on Ways and Means that we were all wrong, and that the law ought not to be repealed; but by the time we got through with them we found the whole transaction reeking and stinking with corruption all over—so much so indeed that Sanborn himself, at the instigation I presume of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] refused to testify.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Why do you presume that?

Mr. FOSTER. Because he said he had a letter from a member of Congress asking him not to testify.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. From me he did not.

Mr. FOSTER. He said that he had got a letter from a member of Congress advising him not to testify.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. His counsel?

Mr. FOSTER. There is nothing but coat-tails about that.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Did you not say in your letter that you were going to give a rap at old Cock-eye?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, I did; and I wish to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if I did not get in a "rap at old Cock-eye" on a former occasion and after the letter was written, say about the 10th of March?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No; not once; not even his coat-tails. You have just said you never got nearer than his coat-tails.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman was fairly knocked down one day here. But no more about that, however; let me go on with my story.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. O, yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Sanborn himself refused to testify. The Committee on Ways and Means found out by those witnesses brought here by Sanborn himself, without any expense to the Government, that he was robbing the Treasury as well as debauching certain internal-revenue officers from New York and New England; that they were simply collecting money that the officers of the Government could collect themselves without any intervention of Mr. Sanborn. We discovered, and you will find it in this report, that he collected several thousand dollars from one of these railroads six months before he had a contract to collect at all; that he collected several thousand dollars, some ten or twelve thousand dollars, without any contract whatever, and many other transactions equally scandalous.

Mr. Speaker, we followed this matter up, and I never asked a question which led to a sight of the gentleman's coat-tails, as you will see if you look through that book of testimony, but what was general in its character. I never asked a question directly about the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER;] I asked about some member of Congress. We found Prescott, No. 12 Pemberton Square. I do not suppose the gentleman knows him, but he has an office in the same building. I do not suppose the gentleman from Massachusetts knew anything about Prescott offering $5,000 to one of the Brooklyn papers to take Sanborn's side of this question. I do not suppose he knew anything about paying money to the man Hughes who stole my letter to aid in securing Sanborn's acquittal in the United States court at Brooklyn. I do not suppose he knows anything about these people, as well as almost every other man engaged in this infamous transaction. But the facts are that in one way or another they all had some sort of a connection with him. My letter was stolen, not picked up in the street as the gentleman says, and given to the gentleman from Massachusetts. I expected my letters would be stolen when I got into this controversy with the gentleman, and I was careful about what I wrote. There is nothing in any letter I have written which calls for explanation. And further, Mr. Speaker, this House, for the protection of its members, had to pass a resolution to keep the gentleman from Massachusetts from stealing telegrams.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have but little more to say about this matter. This investigation was brought on by the friends of and by the gentleman from Massachusetts himself. No other person was to blame. They brought it on, and out of the mouths of their own witnesses this testimony came. We forced it, it is true. We forced Mr. Sanborn to testify. We discovered these frauds which are fully set forth in our report and which have not been and cannot be answered by the gentleman from Massachusetts to-night. The bill repealing the law was passed by a unanimous vote of this House, the gentleman himself being present.

Mr. NIBLACK. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio before he concludes to the manner in which Mr. Sanborn procured information from Europe in regard to income taxes and other claims for taxes.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the gentleman's point?

Mr. NIBLACK. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio to the manner in which Mr. Sanborn procured information from Europe as to certain taxes that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] claimed that Mr. Sanborn had information of, which he proposed to collect if allowed to do so. I desire also to call his attention to the manner in which Mr. Sanborn got information as to certain whisky taxes, also as to certain railroads.

Mr. FOSTER. We have gone over all these things, Mr. Speaker, in our report and in our speeches. But it may be well on this occasion to call the attention of the House and the country to them again.

Now, this railroad case was a marvelous thing. Sanborn made marvelous use of railroad guides; that oath of his is complimented by the gentleman to-night. The acquaintance of Mr. Sanborn with the gentleman from Massachusetts is long-lived. It dates away back to old Fortress Monroe times. This man Sanborn was engaged in business with Mr. Hildreth (I do not care to tell here the relationship between Hildreth and the gentleman) down in the neighborhood of Fortress Monroe, selling goods to the rebels. Hildreth and Sanborn made a great deal of money at that time. I am told that Sanborn was employed as agent of the Adams Express Company. Mr. Bullock was agent of the Adams Express Company South, and played rebel. The company wanted a go-between who would get through the command at Fortress Monroe, where the gentleman from Massachusetts then commanded, and Mr. Sanborn was employed. What we were told as to that is not published, and I will not further allude to it.

Several MEMBERS. Out with it.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, how was this information got about this five million of taxes due from abroad? That is a big sum to talk about. One Mr. Fay—Mr. A. Goodrich Fay, of New York—turns up here employed by the Treasury, a special agent of the Treasury Department at five dollars a day, including Sundays and including expenses, to go abroad to hunt up these income cases. And when he returns we find that Mr. Sanborn turns up an informer in an $800,000 job. That $5,000,000 story is all bosh, and used to cover up his raids as an informer. That is the way that information was obtained.

I do not think it worth while, Mr. Speaker, to detain the House at any greater length on the matter of the Sanborn contracts, and I would not have said a word on this subject but for the personal attack the gentleman from Massachusetts has made upon me.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have made no attack upon you.

Mr. FOSTER. I do know from reputable sources that men have been in my district—under whose auspices I do not know—looking into the matter of my election and trying to find out something about me; for what purpose I am not advised. But I am advised, and I will state it to the House, though the authority may not be very good, that the secret-service fund has been used to send men to my district—I mean the secret service in charge of Colonel Whitley, another one of the gentleman's friends—to look for a fifty-cent counterfeit plate. That was the ostensible purpose of his visit to my district. The real purpose was to hunt up something for the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] to use against me.

I do not suppose the gentleman from Massachusetts knows anything about it. I do not suppose he knows about anybody being sent there. Still, they have been there, and were sent by his friends. But, Mr. Speaker, it seemed to me under this provocation that I had a right to say "old Cock-eye" just once in a letter to a friend.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. That is your stock in trade.

Mr. FOSTER. It is a good stock, is it not?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It is all you have got.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know that I shall say anything further. I only rose to give a history of the connection of the Ways and Means Committee with the Sanborn case and to repel the gentleman's attack. But I do want to make a further remark; and that is about the case of Phelps, Dodge & Co. A more unprovoked, unwarranted, outrageous assault upon reputable gentlemen, I have never heard of, and I believe was never heard by the House or the country before. What Phelps, Dodge & Co. may have done forty years ago I do not know. I am assured that that statuary business occurred before either of the gentlemen now composing this firm were partners in the House. What Phelps, Dodge & Co. did then I know not. But assuming that what has been said about these things is true, it has nothing to do with this case of last year. What is that case? Why, Mr. Speaker, Phelps, Dodge & Co. in the course of five years imported $40,000,000 worth or thereabouts of tin. They paid $5,000,000 of duty, and in that time they overvalued their goods some $300,000. The total loss to the Government charged against them as accruing to the revenue of the country is $1,640. Did they intend to defraud the Government, or was it an error?

Now, Mr. Speaker, when we look at such cases as this we ought to take into account the surroundings. Is there any man living who supposes that Phelps, Dodge & Co. would rob the country of $1,640?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No.

Mr. FOSTER. That is all that is charged against them. Does any man believe that they would rob the country of that sum?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No.

Mr. FOSTER. That was the aggregate for five years, giving an average of about $300 a year. We must judge a case of this kind by its surroundings. If a mendicant or ordinary vagabond should obtain $1,600 that he could not account for we would call him a thief. But when you take into account the standing of Phelps, Dodge & Co. and their vast business, we must admit that they were simply errors; and if errors amounting to $300 a year should creep into a business of $8,000,000 a year, is this the great outrage, is this the great wrong to the Government that the gentleman argues should ruin forever the integrity of a leading firm like Messrs. Phelps, Dodge & Co.?

Mr. Speaker, I say shame on the Government and shame on the men in Congress or out of it who plead for such so-called justice or equity as against such an honorable firm.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if I should invite the gentleman from Massachusetts to my house to dine, and the next day should find a spoon (Jeremiah lii: 19) of mine in his pocket, nobody would believe that he had stolen it; but if found in the pockets of a vagabond we would know that he was the thief.

The trouble is, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] has in his pockets a large fee paid to him out of this robbery as counsel for Jayne, and it is getting too hot to hold it there comfortably. This accounts for the writhings and contortions and abuse of the name of Christian by the gentleman to-night.

Mr. Speaker, I give it as my deliberate opinion, and the country believe and I believe and the Committee on Ways and Means unanimously believe, this Congress believe, that Phelps, Dodge & Co. were deliberately robbed; and I believe furthermore that the country never will do justice by them until they pay them back the money thus extorted from them. Without attempting to elaborate the question, that is my deliberate and honest conviction of that case.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Then why not bring in a bill to repay them?

Mr. FOSTER. The time has not come for that yet. I have now said all I desire to say upon this subject.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I have but a word to say. My colleague has alluded to the fact that when he proposed this evening should be set apart for speaking only, I interposed an objection, and he has chosen to attribute it to personal malignity. I think the experience of many years must have taught my colleague that I have never had any apprehension of affording him any opportunity to express his opinions or his purposes, and have never hesitated to express my own in my own humble way, even if they happened to differ from his. I am not aware he can honestly say he ever knew of a refusal on my part to do him justice.

Mr. Speaker, I thought when I heard that proposition made at this period of the session, when by resolution of both branches we were to end the session next Monday, with the great pressure of public business, with the efforts some of us were making to get to the business upon the Speaker's table in which we felt a deep interest, asking to set apart an entire evening to the exclusion of public business for bringing forward private grievances which could just as well be brought forward on the stump, and to discuss a bill which had already passed both Houses, when the opportunity which was afforded was not accepted by that gentleman, I thought we ought to prefer the public business; and for that reason I interposed the objection. I think so now. I think we should have better spent this evening in attending to the public business than in witnessing the exhibition we have seen. And so far from its having anything malignant in it, Mr. Speaker, if we had known what we should have seen and heard to-night, I think I might appeal to the judgment of the House the utmost friendliness to my colleague would have wished my objection should have prevailed.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, at this late hour in the evening were there more occasion than there now seems to be to occupy the floor of the House, I should be very reluctant to tax its patience. So far as my colleague has made complaint against his colleagues, I am unable in looking back over my own course to suspect he has any disposition to include me in that complaint. Whether he has or not I have this to say: in my connection with these investigations of this House I have followed out a line of policy adopted by me on entering public life, when I entered this House in a minority, and which I have followed from that day to this, most of the time in the majority, never to shrink from the investigation of an alleged fraud or corruption, whether it arose among my political friends or among my political opponents, but at the same time I have studiously kept myself so that that spirit of investigation should neither be limited nor intensified by any personal hate or animosity on my part. And in all of the investigations in which it has been my misfortune to participate in this House, I have adhered to the resolution I adopted for myself when, by appointment of the Speaker in the first Congress in which I served, I entered upon an investigation; the democratic party being then in power and struggling as I believed they did to prevent and to cover up what was proved to be an iniquitous and corrupt proceeding. I then and there pledged myself that if ever I stood upon this floor in a majority I would only bring additional zeal and earnestness and sincerity to the work of bringing to the light and to condemnation and punishment whoever as a thief or as a corrupt man raised his head inside of my own party. And, sir, with no limitation of intensity, because of any personal application or because any individual lay across that path, I have pursued that rule from that day to this. I have never turned from the straight line of any investigation one hair's breadth because it was likely to lay open an unseemly and unsightly transaction in my own party; and I never shall in the little remainder of public life that is left to me.

In pursuance of that rule, in the last Congress, I began this investigation in reference to the effect of giving half of the proceeds of uncollected taxes and one-half of the fines and penalties to men who would turn their backs upon other employments at fixed salaries to engage in this pursuit. I followed it up as well as I could in the last Congress. And upon the very second day of this session, through the aid of this House, I called upon the Treasury Department to disclose what my colleague [Mr. BUTLER] has shown here to-night to be the effect upon honest men of this system which has been enfored in this country for the last fifty years upon the collection of the revenue; an effect which, I agree with him, has been continually growing worse and worse, until with him I believe that under all the force and effect of this system of moieties there has come into the Treasury of this kind of taxes but about two-thirds. Was it not time, then, was it not a matter that commended itself to the Committee on Ways and Means, to look about and see whether there could not be some improvement upon a system of collecting and enforcing revenues which my colleague describes in this way: that the less honesty a man has who is engaged in enforcing the revenue laws the better; that efficiency, according to his idea, and success, according to his idea, are incompatible with honesty in the public service; and therefore you must have agreed to the old adage, "thieves against thieves and rogues to hunt rogues?"

Sir, it did occur to me as a member of the Committee on Ways and Means and I accordingly set on foot the investigation which resulted in a unanimous vote of this House that that system shall continue no longer; it did occur to me that better than imposing new taxes would be an improvement in the system by which the other third of those taxes already imposed should flow into the Treasury of the United States rather than into the pockets of those men of whom my colleague says that the chief commendation they have for their services is that they have no honesty to embarrass or blunt them in their ways and means of detecting rogues. Sir, no effort of my colleague or any other gentleman on this side of the House will enable him or them to enforce upon the republican party as a part of its creed or policy any such doctrine as that. Honesty and efficiency in the public service, properly rewarded by fixed and fair salaries and compensation, I put against my colleague's policy and scheme, coming down though it may from the years that are past, bringing down though it does no other fruit than inordinate fortunes in the pockets of informers and prosecutors, while the deficiencies in the collection of the revenue go on increasing year after year until the startling announcement is made upon this floor by the chief apostle and defender of it all that the result and fruit of it is that under this great system not more than two-thirds can be got into the Treasury! Sir, some other purpose, some other method, some other idea worthy of effort on our part should stimulate us to action and investigation, if the fruit of it all is going to be such a sorry and sad picture as that which my colleague himself spreads out here as the fruit of the system.

Sir, it was in this manner that these investigations originated in the Committee on Ways and Means. My colleague had much to say about the petty pursuits of the Committee on Ways and Means.

He has criticised and complained of the action of the Committee on Ways and Means in pursuing this investigation, and has spread before the House his troubles with one or two members of the committee, and has sought to impugn the motives of the Committee on Ways and Means in their recommendation to this House and in their action which commanded the unanimous vote of the House. I participate in none of that controversy. I stop to make no inquiry concerning it; I have had no part or lot in it. If my colleague from Massachusetts or my colleague on the committee from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] has a grievance, I care not.

Having approached this matter long before the gentleman from Ohio came into the House, at all, and long before my colleague came into it, and therefore could not have any grievance with him or with the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] I have pursued the even tenor of my way as chairman of the committee, directing as well as I could the examination for the purpose of demonstrating what was wrung from the very officials in the administration of public affairs here at Washington with a view to the repeal of that system. Even the last Secretary of the Treasury, when before the Committee on Ways and Means, declared it his conviction that this system ought to be abandoned. Even Jayne declared before the committee that the system was unwise and that it ought not to be continued. No man, no official, has appeared before the committee or has made any communication to the House who has not sustained this view. The late Secretary of the Treasury, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] not only voted to repeal all of these laws, but he declared in his place in the Senate but a few days ago that this same Mr. William E. Dodge, who was put in the front here by my colleague, was an honest man.

Sir, how much co-operation in this work of investigation have we received at the hands of my colleague? Although he had notice from the committee whenever any testimony was introduced there with which his name was connected, he failed to present himself there to be heard upon this question, as he has failed up to this hour to give the House the benefit of his views upon it. He has no cause of complaint against the Committee on Ways and Means for the manner in which they have pursued this investigation, so far as he is personally concerned. He had personal notice every time any testimony appeared before that committee touching him, so that he might have the opportunity to appear there. No man has cause to complain of the action of the committee. We invited the men who were receiving these moieties to appear; we invited the officials in New York, and Boston, and Philadelphia, who were receiving these moieties; but they could not find time or opportunity to appear here and give us the benefit of their counsel. And yet, Mr. Speaker, I saw them around the galleries of this House and at the other end of the Capitol when the question was pending whether these moieties should be cut off entirely. I saw them in the lobbies at this and the other end of the Capitol. There was opportunity and time enough for them to come to Washington to give the aid of their advice to legislators by their votes upon that measure of repeal, but up to this hour the Committee on Ways and Means, so far as they are concerned and so far as my colleague is concerned, have been compelled to grope in the dark, and gather up by the best means they could the information upon this subject which could be wrung from unwilling witnesses.

Sir, whatever others may say of the effect upon the party, and the damage to the republican party, that a republican Committee on Ways and Means has inflicted by these proceedings, I have this to say, that although I have served on many committees in Congress, on none of them do I look back to the work accomplished with more pride and satisfaction than upon the work that has been accomplished by the present Committee on Ways and Means, by which they have wiped out of the statute-book forever that blemish upon the Administration which hitherto has prevailed, a provision that in order to have an efficient prosecutor you must have a dishonest man, that in order that your officers shall pursue with energy the calling of enforcing the revenue they must be stimulated by one-half of all the fruits they can gather from infractions on it.

Sir, I wish to detain the House no longer with comments upon this work of the Committee on Ways and Means. I have no personal controversy, as I have said, with my colleague. There is nothing that has transpired in that committee, over which by your appointment, sir, I have sat as chairman during this investigation, of which any gentleman in this House has any just cause to complain. The committee have submitted to this House and to the other the results of their work. The unanimous approval of both branches of Congress is sufficient for them. If I wanted any other proof of the force and power of the public commendation of this act, I would point to the effort of my colleague here to-night to baffle this current and to struggle against this condemnation of a system which I am sorry to see he has espoused and which he feels bound to defend.

Sir, I can have no lot or part in any such policy. I believe that no such dishonesty on the part of public officers is necessary as he has described here to-night. I believe that if we need more revenue we have need only the more faithfully to collect our taxes. I believe that with honesty and fidelity, with a fair and fixed compensation, we can secure that as the result of the work for which the Committee on Ways and Means have been arraigned before this House and before the country this night. They are ready to appeal from my colleague to the judgment of the House and the country.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. Before the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] sits down——

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. But he has sat down.

Mr. DAWES. If my time has not expired, I will hold the floor long enough to allow a question from my colleague on the committee.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. When the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] was discussing this question on a previous occasion he said, in answer to his colleague, the gentleman from the Essex district of Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] that it was true that the latter had introduced the first bill in this Congress to repeal moieties. I desire now to ask the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, where now is the bill introduced by his colleague from the Essex district?

Mr. DAWES. That bill was hung up by a motion of my colleague to reconsider the reference of the bill to the Committee on Ways and Means and it has never got there yet.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. So that it is true that the gentleman from the Essex district did introduce such a bill, and it is now hanging, as the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means says, upon a motion to reconsider entered by him.

Mr. DAWES. Yes; my colleague had it referred to his own Committee on the Judiciary. After that I had it referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and he entered a motion to reconsider that reference, and it never was reached. I promised to yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TREMAIN.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. How much time is that?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has really recognized, by a nod, the gentleman from Massachusetts, who first spoke to-night, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I will wait until the gentleman from New York [Mr. TREMAIN] is through. Perhaps some members may remain to hear me.

Mr. TREMAIN. Mr. Speaker, understanding that there is no other member of the Committee on Ways and Means who desires to address the House to-night, it seems to me that I cannot, consistently with the duty I owe to an honored firm of constituents, permit this House to adjourn without raising my voice to repel the most extraordinary and unjustifiable aspersions that have been uttered here to-night upon the floor of the American Congress. Phelps, Dodge & Co. are my constituents. For a quarter of a century that firm has occupied a position at the head of the mercantile community of the great commercial emporium, with no stigma or stain resting upon their honor or upon their good name.

To-night the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] has constituted himself their accuser, has appeared as witness against them, and has acted as their judge. No charges are served upon that firm to appear in this Hall; no counsel has a right to appear here to defend them. Slanders are uttered here for which a man would be held personally responsible before the tribunals of his country if uttered where he would be deprived of the immunity that shields him here. He is here protected by the broad ægis of the Constitution, which declares that no man shall be held responsible for words uttered in debate upon the floor of this House.

And yet what have we heard here to-night? For the purpose of defending two dead and buried institutions, and in pronouncing an anathema upon the action of the Committee on Ways and Means of this House for their action in condemning and hurling into that infamy from which no power on earth can lift them—the rotten Jayne moiety system, and the infernal Sanborn contract—the gentleman from Massachusetts has held up the firm of Phelps, Dodge & Co. as swindling merchants, as perjured villains, as men who have been engaged for years in attempting to defraud the revenues of this Government, and as men who ought to be held up before this crowded audience, upon an accusation which shall go upon the wings of the lightning from one end to the other of this Republic, as men who have cheated the community in which they live, in obtaining that reputation and that honor which, forsooth, are to be destroyed before the keener criticisms, the sharper instincts, and the wiser sagacity of the hero of the Sanborn contract and the Jayne moiety system.

No man can deny the power of the gentleman from Essex. But he has not the power to raise the dead; and until he has that power he can never reverse the judgment of this House and of this country that the Sanborn contract and the manner of its performance constitute the most disgraceful and disgusting performance that has ever brought discredit upon the American name. With all his power to please, and to call down the plaudits of the galleries, the gentleman from Massachusetts can never roll back the popular tide or reverse that judgment which is the judgment of the American people that the scenes which have transpired in New York, of which Phelps, Dodge & Co. were the victims, are as deserving of the condemnation of an honest and a justice-loving community as were the diabolical transactions of the inquisition and of the star chamber.

Sir, there is in all this broad land but one man who has the boldness to stand up against the judgment of an honest people, against the unanimous expression of this House, against the conscience and the honest opinions of a thoughtful and a truth-loving community in regard to these transactions. The time for making the defense was when the gentleman from Massachusetts was invited; and he did not come. He was sick! He will be sicker yet before he gets through with his connection with the Sanborn and the Jayne infamies. No man is able to stand up before the American people and sustain these atrocious proceedings.

The gentleman has said that Phelps, Dodge & Co. were guilty of frauds in regard to statuary. Sir, a falser accusation was never made. I know well the history of that stale slander, which has been picked up from the gutters and peddled in your cloak-room. It is false in every part of it.

Let me say in the first place that in the firm of Phelps, Dodge & Co. the name of Phelps is retained although the man who bore it has been dead for many years. Under a statute of New York the name of a deceased member of a firm and of the old firm itself may under certain conditions be continued by those who succeed to the business. Of course it would never be continued except where it has acquired credit and standing by probity and integrity and is a name that ought to be perpetuated.

Sir, it was nearly fifty years ago that an act of Congress was passed increasing the duty upon lead in pigs and bars from one to three cents per pound. What was the occasion of the increase? Lead mines had been discovered at Galena, Illinois, and according to the system of that day, of protecting American productions and American industry, this duty was increased 200 per cent. There had before that time grown up in the cities of Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, and Boston large manufacturing establisments, concerned in the manufacture of white-lead, in one of which the old firm of Phelps & Peck (the name of the dead Phelps being perpetuated in the firm) were interested. When that statute was passed, somewhere from 1820 to 1824—I do not remember the exact year—these large establishments found that their business was failing; and they looked around to see in what manner they could reimburse themselves for the losses they sustained by reason of the legislation of Congress. They found that this statute, which was under the old system of duties, had left upon old lead, so called, an ad valorem duty of 15 per cent.

I never heard that there was anything wrong in acting precisely according to law. These manufacturing establishments consequently concluded to import old lead. I will show you by and by that as to the statuary story even the firm of Phelps & Peck had no more connection with it than the gentleman from Essex. There was a great demand for old lead. The consequence was that in the old establishments in England the roofs that were made of old lead were taken off, new lead put on, and the old lead imported to this country. Merchants and the officers of the customs submitted the question to the Treasury Department, where it was decided, properly and legally, that no more than 15 per cent. could be collected on old lead under the statute, although that lead was afterward used for the ordinary purposes for which pig-lead and bar-lead would be used.

Congress, when the next session came, proceeded to cure that omission in the old law. They did so. Then these gentlemen looked around; and they found that there was still another provision in the tariff laws under which musket-balls and bullets were admitted at a duty of 15 per cent. ad valorem. There was then a wonderful demand for bullets and musket-balls, old and new. They were brought over in immense numbers. Again the revenue officers submitted the question to the Government; and the Treasury officials decided that the importation of bullets and balls at 15 per cent. ad valorem was according to law; that the Government could not help itself. At the next session another law was passed patching up that hole in the tariff. But afterward it was discovered that there was still another item left with a duty of only 15 per cent. ad valorem; and that was leaden weights and leads used by sailors. There was then a wonderful demand all at once for weights and leads. The old weights were found to be very defective. Every shipper and every sailor wanted a new set of leads. A large number were imported. In the mean time a suit was brought in New York by Mr. Price, the district attorney, but he was ignominiously beaten; for the judge, upon the first hearing of the case, dismissed the complaint on the part of the Government. Then this defect in the law was supplied. But there was still left the old statute which said that statuary and busts should be admitted either free of duty or at a small duty. Well, there never was such a demand for busts since the time when my colleague [Mr. COX] got his bust made when he and I were in Florence. Why, sir, they had statues of all the great men of ancient and modern times. They had Moses and Aaron, and Benjamin and Joshua, and Cæsar and Napoleon, and Wellington, and Washington, and Jefferson, and everybody else, run into statues on the other side. Some of them came over, to be sure, as has been said, with an eye knocked out, or a nose battered, or fingers dislocated; still you could recognize them. They came in in great quantities. A suit was undertaken to be brought in New York; but Mr. Price had had sufficient experience in that line, and he thought he would not venture upon the experiment. They went up to Boston and they sued an honorable old merchant, who was one of these white-lead manufacturers, for importing these leaden statues which, according to the language of the gentleman from Massachusetts, were transferred to the melting-pots. They brought suit against him. What did the old merchant do? His name I do not remember—perhaps some one from Massachusetts here will.

A MEMBER. His name was Leavitt.

Mr. TREMAIN. Yes; I think his name was Leavitt. What did he do? No doubt if the lawyer from Essex had been there he would have run for his office if the Government officer had not got there ahead of him. As he was not there they had to take a man of less importance, and they employed a man you may have heard of by the name of Daniel Webster. Mr. Webster went into court to defend his old friend, an old Boston merchant. They proved he imported these old leaden statues, and they probably could have satisfied the jury if that had been material that he meant to melt them as soon as he had got them into his store. What did Mr. Webster do? Mr. Webster said to the judge, "I ask you to instruct the jury that the only question in this case is a question of fact, whether the articles seized by the Government were or were not statuary." It was not a question of law, but a question of fact for the jury. The judge, as he was bound to do, responded to that request by charging the jury in accordance with the request, and the jury without leaving their seats gave a verdict in favor of the defendant that he had violated no law.

And that is all there is, Mr. Speaker, of this stale old statuary story, dug up from the gutters to sustain the rotten cause of the Sanborn contract and of the Jayne moiety system and to bring discredit upon the name of Phelps, Dodge & Co.

Now, whether these transactions by the importers were moral or immoral is a question I am not called upon to determine. It is enough, however, to say in this connection that at that time no member of the present firm of Phelps, Dodge & Co., had any connection with it. It is enough to say that the firm which was then in existence, and the predecessor of this firm, was the old firm, of Phelps & Peck, that the firm of Phelps & Peck never had anything to do with the importing of leaden statuary and busts, and that the story even as to them is made out of whole cloth, thrown in here when there was no man supposed to be familiar with the facts to defend the firm of Phelps, Dodge & Co. against a charge entirely in harmony with the general character of the transactions which the Committee on Ways and Means have properly sought to reform and this House has by its unanimous judgment condemned.

Again, the gentleman tells us Mr. Dodge claimed a particular interpretation of the statute in regard to the amount of duties which should be collected upon tin plates. I am informed by an honored merchant from Boston on the floor of this House, since that charge was made, for I knew nothing of it and this is no time to be called on to defend an absent man against a charge made under the privileges of the House—I am informed by that honored merchant, who is familiar with the whole transaction, that in regard to that the Treasury Department fully sustained the claim which was made by Mr. Dodge.

Allusion has been made to the action of the Committee on Ways and Means in recommending the tariff bill which proposed a specific duty upon tin and the boxes in which it was contained. So far from being a cause of censure againt the firm of Phelps, Dodge & Co., that transaction is evidence of their strong desire to conform to the law, and to guard against the defects and abuses existing under the law which had been the means of robbing them of $271,000. Look at it for a moment.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. TREMAIN. I understood the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] one of the Committee on Ways and Means, to say he would yield to me whatever time he had.

Mr. BECK. I told the gentleman from New York if I had any time I would yield it to him.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The gentleman has yielded his time once or twice.

Mr. TREMAIN. This gentleman himself has had two hours. I understood the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] was willing to yield his time to me.

Mr. BECK. The gentleman from New York asked me if I would give him my time. I told him I believed I was on the list, and if I had any time I would surrender it to him as I did not expect to speak myself.

Mr. TREMAIN. My name is on the list and I have the right to speak in my own right.

Mr. RANDALL. Go on; we have given the other side two hours.

Mr. TREMAIN. Mr. Speaker, what was the old law which is now condemned? If a man imported tin manufactured in the interior of England—and it is mostly manufactured in Wales—if he by mistake omits to put into the invoice the expense of cartage or of telegraphs or of expressage or of boxes or of any other item whatever, under that old law, which finds its vindicator here, not only was the article forfeited, but the whole invoice in which that article was contained was forfeited.

Nay, more; it was not necessary to show that there was any intention to defraud the Government. The Supreme Court decided that when the word "fraudulently" was omitted it was only necessary to show that the invoice was entered at less than the actual cost, and that it became a matter of law in such a case to instruct the jury that the whole invoice was forfeited. It was under such an odious system that Phelps, Dodge & Co. were sought to be charged with $271,000 of forfeiture. Now what was the amount of duty of which it was charged they defrauded the Government? Why, sir, but $1,600. Here, sir, is a firm which had paid more than fifty million dollars into the Treasury; while the Ways and Means Committee state it has been proved before them that they overpaid to the Government on other articles three or four thousand dollars of duty. Yet these men were to be held responsible in the large amount I have named for these trifling inaccuracies in their invoices. It was to guard against that that Phelps, Dodge & Co. and all the other tin merchants and importers of the country presented the memorial to Congress from which the gentleman from Massachusetts only read the first name, that of Phelps, Dodge & Co.; and that memorial asked that the tariff be changed. They were willing to have put on a duty which would give the Government greater revenue than they have derived from that source for the last three years. They thought one cent on the tin and boxes was enough. The committee of this House put it at one and a quarter cents. That is what there is about that.

Now, who is Mr. Dodge? He is a man who has been a member of this House, the peer of any gentleman upon this floor, the man who, after all these charges were made against him, was elected by the unanimous vote of the merchants of New York president of the Chamber of Commerce in that great city, a position that he occupies to-day. Can a man acquire such a reputation and so enjoy the confidence of his fellow-merchants if he is that rotten and corrupt and swindling merchant that he has been held up before this House to be by the gentleman from Massachusetts? Shall his good character go for nothing? Can long years of integrity and probity go for nothing? Shall his reputation for Christianity and piety, evidenced by the fruits that are welcomed everywhere by the Christian community as springing from a good heart, go for nothing? Is such a man to be ridiculed before your galleries as a man that preaches in the day-time and prays at night? Is the American Congress to listen to harangues of that character?

Then the gentleman, after haranguing the House for two hours, now seeks to stifle the voice of the Representative from New York, who has no other interest at all in this firm except simply to have justice done. It seems to me that this whole debate to-night has been in the nature of a funeral oration by the gentleman from Massachusetts over the dead; the dead and the corrupt; the dead and the condemned; the dead and the infamous. And if the gentleman from Massachusetts thinks that he is to be held as the savior of the republican party from the Ways and Means Committee, to whose eleven members he so triumphantly bids defiance, he will find that he is laboring under an egregious mistake.

The people are quick to discover an honest desire on the part of the Ways and Means Committee and of this House to correct abuses and reform the existing laws. This House by both its parties, to their honor be it said, without regard to political considerations, have condemned these laws and wiped them out of existence, and they will be heard of I trust no more forever.

There was another subject I desired to speak on; but if the House will give me permission to print my remarks I will not detain it longer this evening.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. If there be anything personal in them you cannot.

Mr. TREMAIN. I will tell the gentleman that I intend my remarks to relate to the extraordinary debate, the extraordinary personalities, the extraordinary course that was taken in the closing hours of the debate upon the Geneva award bill, a bill that has passed this House. But I rejoice for the honor of my country that the triumph that was won here is destined, I believe, to be short-lived and to yield no fruits.

It requires not merely the consent of this House, but the consent of the Senate and the President, before a raid can be successfully made upon the public Treasury, whereby four millions of honest property can be confiscated and ten millions can be taken and given to a class of men who have no claims in law or equity upon them. That question is wholly postponed and to come before this House at its next session. I desire to notice some extraordinary aspersions, some extraordinary arguments, some extraordinary personal remarks that were made during that discussion; and I think it will be quite as proper, as that subject is still alive, to speak to it as to spend two hours in talking about dead issues. My speech would relate to the Geneva award, and I ask unanimous consent to print my remarks upon that subject.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. You shall not have mine, sir.

Mr. TREMAIN. Amen. You will hear from me at Philippi. We will meet there.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have to ask from the House a little indulgence.

Mr. TREMAIN. I rise to a point of order. Has the gentleman from Massachusetts the right to speak twice on the same subject?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am going to speak upon an entirely different subject. I am going to speak upon the gentleman from New York, who is an entirely new and different subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to speak again unless some other gentleman desires to occupy the floor.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS] tried to quote Shakespeare in ridicule of my sickness; thus one member of the Committee on Ways and Means ridicules my eyes, and another ridicules my sickness. I am grieved that I am not always well. I am sorry that I cannot always be equal in health and good looks to the majority of the Committee on Ways and Means. But the most remarkable exhibition has been that of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TREMAIN,] who told us when he first came upon this floor that he represented the whole State of New York, and that he had thirty-two Representatives from that State as his constituents, and he tried also to quote Shakespeare. Let me try if I cannot quote Shakespeare too, and see if I cannot do a little better:

> The little dogs and all,
> Tray, Blanch, and Sweet-heart, see, they bark at me.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. And bite.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Ah, yes; but only timid persons get the hydrophobia from the bite of very little dogs.

But, Mr. Speaker, let us be serious about this business. I want no better witness than the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TREMAIN.] He comes here and tells the House and the country, in addition to what I endeavored to say, that I did not think all merchants were honest. If he is to be believed they are all dishonest. Why, sir, we put a duty on lead to protect our western mines, but allowed "old lead" to come in at a very small rate of duty, and long years ago the merchants of New York, Philadelphia, Boston, and Baltimore evaded the law by tearing off the leaden roofs from houses of London and importing them into this country as old lead so as to evade our tariff. I call that swindling. I may not understand New York morality, but according to the New Testament, which tells you that you should do unto others as you would have them do unto you, that is swindling. Well, Congress patched up that law and stopped that leak; but it could not foresee all the rascality that was possible on the part of merchants. This was just after the war of 1812, and Congress passed a law providing that no lead should come in without the payment of duty, except bullets. Well, sir, these merchants, these honest men, the praying men, cast all their lead into bullets and brought them in free of duty. I should say that that was another swindle. It was cheating the Government under the forms of law, getting around the law, evading the law, using the law to enrich themselves at the expense of their country. That is what I call swindling. I am obliged to the gentleman for the facts he states. One of the house of Phelps, Dodge & Co. was in those frauds he admits.

The gentleman avers that I should not dare charge this firm of Phelps, Dodge & Co. with swindling and defrauding the Government were I not protected from suit, because I am protected from suit for what I say here in this House.

Now I want, once for all, to say to the gentleman from New York that I will claim no privilege, I will shield myself by no privilege. I will stand out on the common here at any hour he may name, and in the presence of as many reporters as he can bring there I will make these statements over again, and he may sue me for slander, and I will endeavor to respond to the judgment of the court after he gets a verdict of any honest jury against me.

Congress also allowed lead to come in free as clock-weights; that was in favor of Connecticut, where they make clocks, and thereupon these merchants, he says, brought in all this lead free of duty in that form, and thus cheated the revenue. Congress stopped that fraud by a new law, and Connecticut could have no more clock weights unless she paid duty on them. What did the merchants do then? I am only commenting on the testimony of my witness [Mr. TREMAIN] here from New York. What was the next thing they did? They looked around, and they found that statuary and busts came in free of duty, and then they cast all the pig-lead imported into statuary, and thus brought it in free of duty; and when the Government undertook to stop that fraud, they got Daniel Webster to defend them, and he convinced a jury that they had a right to import statuary free of duty, and so they succeeded in swindling the Government in that way. Now, sir, this is the honesty of the mercantile community on the testimony of their defender who volunteers here in their behalf.

Now, I undertake to say that there is not a man in this House who professes honesty that can look an honest man in the face and say that that is either just, or proper, or right, this taking advantage of the law to swindle the country. But does not the gentleman's statement cover exactly what I told you of? I said that it was notorious that for years and years the firm of Phelps, Dodge & Co., whatever members may have composed it, had been taking all manner of technical advantages to swindle the country. If I had not proved it before it is proved now; here is the witness, their advocate, putting in their defense.

The gentleman says I brought this charge of importing lead as statuary, which he admits to be true, out of the gutter. Let us see where I brought it from. I took it from the congressional reports; I had it read at the desk of your Clerk from the Congressional Globe. Senator MORRILL was one of the debaters; Mr. ELDRIDGE of this House was another; Thaddeus Stevens was another, and he charged it as a swindle upon the revenue by Phelps, Dodge & Co.

And then upon this question of cheating in tin plates. The gentleman says why should they not, if they could only get a ruling of the Department to enable them to bring in these tin plates at too low duty because they were not "galvanized tin plates," and thus defraud the nation. Ay, why not? Why should they not cheat? I know of but one reason why they should not? Because it is dishonest to cheat; that is all, that is the only reason; that may not be a good reason in New York, but elsewhere it is; because it is not doing an honest thing, it is not doing an upright thing, and it is not doing the thing that ought to be done. I may be all wrong; I may be one of those that have not proper moral conceptions. But I would here declare that I would rather defend Sanborn and Jayne and everybody else I have heard of on the other side of this transaction, than to defend a merchant who undertakes to cheat his country in time of war, when her soldiers were bleeding upon the field of battle, by frauds and tricks cheat her out of millions of dollars each year, as these merchant princes, Phelps, Dodge & Co., did. That is all; and I dismiss them forever. If there is any man here who chooses now to defend them, be it so. After this exhibition of their case by the gentleman from New York, if there is any man here who wants to say that theirs is good morality to inculcate in his children, that this is a good thing to do, that the law ought to be made and tariffs fixed for such men, then be it so. That is what your committee has done.

The gentleman from New York says that we should not attack absent men. Why, then, does he denounce a man by name, Mr. Jayne, who is absent? I have never said anything here about Mr. Jayne, good or bad. What has Mr. Jayne done? As a special agent of the Treasury Department it was his duty when frauds were brought to his notice to inform the proper officers and have them punished. He did so; and of forty-nine cases he convicted forty-eight in court by the plea of guilty, and he brought into the Treasury in two years $3,000,000 fines and penalties, as that book shows. That is all he has done.

Mr. DAWES. That is not all; he took half of it out.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No, sir, he did not; that is a simple mistake that both you and others have made.

Mr. DAWES. He and his friends about him did.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. No, sir; pardon me again.

Mr. DAWES. They divided it up.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Wait a minute, don't hurry; be a little careful now. He put $3,000,000 into the Treasury for fines and penalties within two years, he and others, independent of what they took out. Look at the record. That is as I understand it. They did according to the law of the land, and they did it by the judgment of the court. That is the beginning and the end of their offending.

Mr. DAWES. I think my colleague is mistaken about the sum. But if he is not mistaken, they took out $2,000,000, or more.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I do not care if they took out $10,000,000; they took out no more than the law allowed them as part of what they put in.

Mr. DAWES. The report shows they took out two or three million dollars.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. We have the report here. I do not care to go into the figures at this hour of the night. Let us turn to another part of this case. The gentleman from New York, who visited Europe last year [Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS] and who came back just in season to pay his back salary into the Treasury, upon which I doubt not he spent his time very pleasantly in Europe—the gentleman from New York has had the kindness to have read at the Clerk's desk extracts from the evidence to show that I knew about this case because I was counsel. Why, sir, as it came out before his committee and without my fault, as I do not willingly disclose my clients' business, I will tell the whole of it now, especially as great pains have been taken that the statement should not appear in the report. I never had anything to do with fixing the penalty Phelps, Dodge & Co. should pay; they were all fixed before I came into the matter. But the informer brought to Mr. Jayne a bundle of letters which compromised some of the first women in New York quite as much in their conduct with the younger members of that firm as the firm were compromised with the United States; and the question was with Mr. Jayne, what should be done with those letters? The informer who brought them to Mr. Jayne said to him, "You must use those letters to get more money." Jayne said, "I will not." Then it was replied, "If you do not I will complain to the Secretary of the Treasury." Mr. Jayne came to me and said, "Ought I to use those letters for any such purpose?" I said to him, "Not by any manner of means." Mr. Jayne then called young Mr. Phelps before him and put those letters into the fire; and young Phelps took him by the hand and thanked him for so doing. I went with Mr. Jayne and explained the transaction to the Secretary of the Treasury, who said to Mr. Jayne, "You did right; you acted like an honorable man."

The only thing I ever had to do with this question of penalty was when two of Phelps, Dodge & Co.'s lawyers came into my office here in Washington and said, "Will you not go to the Secretary of the Treasury and advise him to take this $270,000 and settle this case?" I said, "I will not go and advise him, because it would do more harm than good; he understands his own matters perfectly; I cannot be of service to you in the matter." My connection with the case was because of a private transaction which the Government had nothing to do with; and but for the gentleman from Ohio, who in the course of the testimony over and over again pressed it out, picked it out, drew it out, hammered it out, and got it out, it would never have come out here at all. I did nothing in that matter more than I would do when the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] is attacked and comes to me for counsel, as he will I doubt not. I do not know but that I would defend even the gentleman from New York, [Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS,] provided my fees were large enough. For these reasons I have nothing to apologize for or retract upon that matter.

But why drag in these matters of personality except as they show that this investigation in the Sanborn case was, upon the testimony of the gentleman from Ohio, got up, not by the Committee on Ways and Means, but by himself and the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK;] the object being on the part of the latter, properly and rightly from his political point of view, to break down the Administration; and the object of the gentleman from Ohio being to break me down to get even with me. My whole offense (as has crept out in the statement of the gentleman from New York, who is acting under my colleague's inspiration,) was that it was necessary that gubernatorial honors should not be allowed to anybody in my State except to a chosen few of high respectability, such men as import lead bullets against the law, and tear off lead roofs in London in order to cheat the revenue—"highly respectable merchants!"

To my colleague, [Mr. E. R. HOAR,] who with such solemnity asks me whether I honestly think he would do an unjust thing toward me, I answer in the same candor with which he puts the question, that if he knew it I do not believe he would. But I think the bent of his mind is so bitter that he does not know when he does a thing which he ought not to do against a man whom he does not like. Is he satisfied with the answer? I am.

Mr. TOWNSEND obtained the floor and said: I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TREMAIN,] after which I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Florida, [Mr. PURMAN.]

Mr. TREMAIN. Mr. Speaker, it is difficult to tell which most to admire, the high-toned sense of honor and morality of the gentleman from Massachusetts, who sees so much fraud in the conduct of men who have been vindicated and sustained by the action of a court and jury, or his logic in finding in my argument a sufficient ground to condemn Phelps, Dodge & Co. Sir, I have stated distinctly, and the gentleman knows it well, that Phelps & Peck, who were the firm in existence when the statuary was imported some forty or fifty years ago, had no agency whatever in its importation. They had no more connection with it than had the gentleman from Massachusetts, and yet, forsooth, he finds in my remarks sufficient to sustain his charges against Phelps, Dodge & Co., and proceeds to indulge in a general tirade of abuse against the merchants of this country—merchants whose names are synonyms for honor, for patriotism, and for integrity, and who would not thank me for vindicating them against the frivolous and unfounded aspersions of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Again, he asks why did I denounce Jayne? I denounced the systems with which Jayne and Sanborn were associated. I exonerate the officers of the law, for they are honorable officials in the city of New York, who no doubt did what honorable men should have done in executing the law. I would not be understood as criticising in any manner the action of the revenue officers of New York, for all of whom I entertain the highest respect and esteem. But it was the system I denounced, and I rejoice that it has been condemned and forever exploded.

The gentleman says we drag in personalities. A singular complaint from such a source! Who but he has introduced personalities into this House? Who but he in the Geneva award debate, which he now objects to my answering, introduced personalities? I send to the Clerk a passage I desire to have read in regard to personalities. I ask the Clerk to read that portion which is marked. The gentleman's speech is withheld from the RECORD, and hence I send up Harper's Weekly, which contains the newspaper version of the transaction.

The Clerk read as follows:

In the further course of Mr. BUTLER's argument, Mr. TREMAIN asked him if he would allow him to put a question.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Yes, if you will keep quiet afterward.

Mr. TREMAIN. That depends upon whether you tell the truth or not.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. If that is a good reason, you will keep quiet all your life, and die with your tongue dumb; but the difficulty is that Tweed was convicted, and the lawyer who convicted him cannot keep quiet ever since.

Mr. TREMAIN. And you sympathize with him?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I do, with such a counsel as was against him. [Laughter.]

Mr. TREMAIN. Undoubtedly there is a bond of sympathy between you.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I think that such a man should be hunted by lions, and not by jackals. [Laughter.] Do you see the disadvantage of interrupting?

Mr. TREMAIN. None whatever.

Mr. TREMAIN. Now, Mr. Speaker, let me recall to this House the circumstances under which that violation of the rules of this House was perpetrated. Three speeches had been made on the part of the champions of the war premiums, without any opportunity to reply, under the management of the gentleman from Massachusetts. No answer was allowed to the question which I proposed to put to one of his field-marshals, the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE.] a gentleman for whom I entertain the highest regard. When closing the debate the gentleman from Massachusetts stated that Judge POLAND'S bill declared insurance companies should be paid, a statement that was utterly unfounded in fact, and I asked, in accordance with the courtesy and usages of the House, if he would permit me to put a question. You have the answer before you. Sir, the time has been, when I was younger than I am, and had as I think a more imperfect view of my duty, when swift and certain punishment would have followed the application of that language to me.

But, sir, I trust I never shall forget that solemn declaration that "Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord." I have too much self-respect and too high a regard for the honor of this House to respond in the same coin, no matter how copious and abundant may be the wealth of materials available at my command. Nor, sir, do I believe the good people of this country will believe me to be a jackal, nor complain of my agency in convicting the notorious Tweed. No such language as I have quoted nor any other from the same source can insult me. I believe rather, sir, that the honest judgment of the thinking, sensible people of this country, as they read at their breakfast tables that extraordinary exhibition on the floor of the House of Representatives, would be, "What else can you expect than a comparison drawn from the animal creation when that comparison comes from the mouth of"—I forbear from finishing the sentence.

The gentleman has quoted Shakespeare. Let me also quote Shakespeare as applicable to him. On the Geneva-award debate this Hall rang during three hours with charges, when no opportunity was given to answer; when even fifteen minutes were refused to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] to say a few words in favor of insurance companies, though the pledge had been given when consent to close the debate at three o'clock was obtained from us that we should have one-half the time—I say the Hall rang with all sorts of charges, among which were charges against Mr. Evarts, ex-Attorney-General of the United States, a man standing, if not at the head, at least in the front rank of his profession in New York and in the country, with charges against every lawyer who did not speak against the insurance companies as having been bought, not directly, not in a manly way, but in that insinuating, ambiguous form which the gentlemen know how to employ without violating the rule which prohibits personalities, and yet carrying the impression to the groundlings that every man who stood up here in favor of what he supposed to be the claims of justice and right was paid by the insurance companies. The very able gentleman from Maine, the field-marshal of the commander-in-chief—I will not put him down so low in rank as to call him a lieutenant or adjutant—the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] said, "Do not put this case into the courts, for there the insurance companies are sure to win."

But the gentleman from Maine says do not put this case into the courts, because there the insurance companies are sure to win. It is a well-settled principle of equity that the insurance companies were subrogated to the rights of the assured. And so it went on for the benefit of the war-premium claimants, and the ten millions were to be taken out of the Treasury and distributed among the men that were not entitled to it.

Now, there is a description of such another crusade that I find in Shakespeare's second part of King Henry VI. Shakespeare has described all sorts of people in ancient and modern times, and he gives Jack Cade's language to Dick the butcher, Smith the weaver, and others of a similar stripe, who rallied around him, in these words:

CADE. Be brave, then; for your captain is brave, and vows reformation. There shall be, in England, seven half-penny loaves sold for a penny: the three-hooped pot shall have ten hoops; and I will make it felony to drink small beer; all the realm shall be in common and in Cheapside shall my palfry go to grass. And, when I am king, (as king I will be,)——

ALL. God save your majesty!

CADE. I thank you, good people:—there shall be no money; all shall eat and drink on my score; and I will apparel them all in one livery, that they may agree like brothers, and worship me their lord.

DICK. The first thing we do, let's kill all the lawyers.

CADE. Nay, that I mean to do. Is not this a lamentable thing, that of the skin of an innocent lamb should be made parchment? that parchment, being scribbled o'er, should undo a man? Some say, the bee stings: but I say, 'tis the bee's wax; for I did but seal once to a thing, and I was never mine own man since.

The difference between the ancient Jack Cade and the modern is that instead of saying there should be no money, the modern Jack Cade says, "You shall have your pockets full of money, all glittering in bright greenbacks, bearing the stamp of the Government."

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate insisted on its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 3094) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, disagreed to the amendments of the House to other amendments of the Senate, and agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and had appointed Mr. WEST, Mr. RAMSEY, and Mr. SHERMAN to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the joint resolution (H. R. No. 112) directing the Public Printer to keep an account o all expenditures for printing, mailing, and binding the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, &c.

The message further announced that the Senate agreed to the concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives directing the distribution of the three thousand copies of the Statistical Atlas of the United States based on the results of the ninth census, now being compiled by Francis A. Walker, the publication of which is provided for by the act of March 3, 1873.

RECOGNITION OF CUBA.

Mr. PURMAN. Mr. Speaker, the first cry of freedom in Cuba, though in a different language from ours, sobbing across the narrow Gulf Stream, received a ready response and re-echo in the chivalric hearts of Florida. Florida, once a sister with Cuba in the family of the once great Spanish nation, cannot be oblivious to the struggling condition of her less fortunate relation. The blood of a historical consanguinity yet courses through the veins and memory of our people.

It was the good fortune of our State to have been first plucked from the grasp of Spanish dominion by the reckless gallantry of a cavalier general and in violation of all international law, and the jewel of American liberty was set upon her brow in the similitude of a captive beauty crowned by her conquering and conquered knight. She escaped the penalty of a bloody revolution paid by all her other sisters as the price of their liberty and independence.

Severed so early by a most happy fate from the mother family and blessed like a beautiful damsel of poor estate wedded by a mighty king, she has not grown selfish in her happiness nor haughty in her superior station, but like a true sister comes to the rescue with all the power of tears and prayers—tears to beseech propitiation from Heaven, and prayers to beseech mercy and recognition from this United States Congress.

In the session of 1870 the Legislature of our State spoke as follows by the adoption of the resolution introduced by myself:

Resolved by the people of the State of Florida, represented in senate and assembly, That we are not and cannot be indifferent to the eventful history which our neighbors are enacting on the island of Cuba in their patriotic endeavors for freedom and independence. That by our proximity of country, by the comity that has always so happily prevailed between our respective people, by our own love of liberty, and by the promptings of our own political religion, that all nations should be free and enjoy the blessings of popular institutions, we extend our heartfelt sympathies and hopes to the struggling patriots of Cuba, and with them unite our invocations for their speedy deliverance from oppression and their victorious establishment of a free government, which is the only rightful authority on earth to which universal man should acknowledge obedience; and that our expressions of fellowship in feeling and prayer may carry with them at least the power of a moral support and encouragement, we hereby request our Representatives and Senators in the Congress of the United States to respond to the strong popular sentiment of the whole country, and at once accord by the sovereign voice of Congress those belligerent rights and protection to the cause of free Cuba which a common justice, kindred principles, and an enlightened humanity demand, and which are sanctioned by the usage and laws of nations.

Again, in the session of 1874, upon the resolution introduced by Senator Howe, of Key West:

Whereas the people of the island of Cuba have been and are still struggling for their national existence and are trying to establish a free government for themselves and their children; and whereas the war waged by the Spanish government has no parallel for its inhumanity in modern times, and should not be permitted by any civilized nation: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the people of the State of Florida, represented in senate and assembly, That the Congress of the United States is requested to adopt such legislation as may be necessary to enable the national Government to extend such aid to the people of Cuba as becomes a great republic, whose people so ardently sympathize with an oppressed nation.

And be it further resolved, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress are requested to present these resolutions to their respective bodies as expressive of the sense of the people of Florida.

Again, through the voice of her chief executive, who sent the following telegram greeting to President Grant upon the apprehension of difficulties arising from the capture of the Virginius and the assassination of portion of the crew:

STATE OF FLORIDA,
Executive Office, Tallahassee, Florida, November 20, 1873.

U. S. GRANT,
President of the United States, Washington, D. C.:

In case of serious difficulty with Spanish authorities in Cuba Florida will do its duty; and as we hold the front position geographically, so we will claim the front rank in the cause of national honor and human liberty.

M. L. STEARNS,
Governor.

This tender to the President meant indignation at the insult offered our flag, earnestness for the vindication of its honor; for it was written by a governor with his left hand, having already lost his right arm in defense of his country's flag.

Thus has our State spoken in the most solemn and authorized manner known to our constitution; and were I, from any possibility, to remain silent upon this floor upon this stirring question of a people who are are our neighbors by geography, political aspirations, and reciprocal interests, fighting and dying for liberty and independence, I would be recreant to my own convictions of duty and to the most sanguine sentiments of my constituents.

Sir, I give my most cordial support of heart and hand and vote to the resolution of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] for the recognition of the independence of Cuba.

If the principles and facts enunciated in the four propositions of the preamble to the resolution are correct, then every unbiased mind cannot fail to see in the logical deduction independence, and independence only.

The first proposition is—

It is the clear and undoubted right of any American colony to sever its connection with the mother colony, and establish itself as an independent nation, whenever the good of its people requires it.

Is this proposition as a political principle correct, and sanctioned by the proudest pages in the history of our own country?

The grandest monument to the wisdom and patriotism of our revolutionary sires is the immortal declaration of our own independence as Colonies from the kingdom of Great Britain. They declared life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness as the fundamental and inalienable rights of man, having been endowed with these rights not by any ancient parental monarchy or free constitution, but by their own Creator; that only for the purpose of securing these rights were governments instituted among men, and the powers of such governments are alone derived from the expressed will of the majority of the governed; that whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these rights, it is the right of the people to alter or abolish it and institute a new government for their better safety and happiness.

Such was the new political doctrine adopted by our colonial fathers in the New World; and after another declaration that the colonies are and of right ought to be free and independent, they mutually pledged to each other their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor for the support of their new doctrine, and the Rubicon was crossed forever.

What degenerate son will deny a single principle baptized in the blood of our own Revolution, or deface a single stone bright with our own glory in this temple of liberty reared for us by our forefathers? "Whenever the good of its people requires it!" Sir, God and the enlightened world know that the good of the 677,951 white people, and the good of the 605,461 colored people in Cuba, over a quarter of a million of the latter being bound in abject slavery, require as speedily as the pen of fate can write the event the fullest abolishment of the last vestige of Spanish domination over the island.

What nameless oppressions for centuries have been endured by the devoted people of this beautiful island the Christian world never could fully know.

The Spanish tyrant repressed all general education, prevented the free introduction of knowledge among the people, suppressed all societies for the promotion of any useful or popular purpose, and under such a never-ceasing system of suppression the Cuban's history, as apart from the unreliable information furnished by the tyrant himself, remains unwritten, and preserved only in cherished tradition.

From the day the native Indian chief Hatuey was burned at the stake, exclaiming with his dying breath, "I prefer hell to heaven if there are Spaniards in heaven," to the hour when the late President Cespedes, discovered by a Spanish detachment in the Sierra Maestra Mountains, fired the contents of his last revolver at them and cast himself headlong over the rocky precipice, preferring a sublime suicide to Spanish capture, this island has been the scene of such tyranny and crimes as to shock all Christendom and cause the very heavens to weep.

Hear but a hasty recital of the wrongs that have crushed generations after generations, and ask yourselves the question whether the American people have no sympathy for these heroic patriots, and whether our recognition of their independence, not by enthusiastic declamation, but by the passage of this resolution, is not our solemn duty in the interest of an exalted and prophetic patriotism, and in the light of that Christianity which teaches us to love our neighbor as ourself.

Hear the wrongs, hoary with age and to-day dripping with the blood of the oppressor and the oppressed.

The island has been under martial law since 1825.

Cuba is permitted no representation in the Cortes or Congress of Spain.

The natives of the island are excluded entirely from the army, the judiciary, the treasury, and the customs.

The military government assumes the charge of the schools, and the inhabitants are forbidden to send their sons to the United States for educational purposes, and only one child out of eighteen is allowed to be taught to read and write.

The press is under the vilest censorship and newspapers from abroad with few exceptions are contraband, while letters passing through the post are opened and purged of their contents before delivery.

Cubans are deprived of all arms, and are not allowed to carry even a fruit-knife under a penalty of imprisonment for six years, and are fined five pasos (dollars) for carrying canes of a larger size than can be easily introduced into a gun-barrel.

A Cuban must purchase a license before he can invite a few friends to take a cup of tea at his board, and no person can remove from one house to another without first paying for a government permit.

Farmers are compelled to pay 10 per cent. on all their harvests as soon as gathered except sugar, and on that article 2½ per cent.

Upon every species of property sold the sum of 10 per cent. on the purchase price must be paid to the government.

The grazing of cattle is taxed exorbitantly, and no goods either in or out of doors can be sold without a license.

They have no right of trial by jury, no liberty of speech or of the press, and are not permitted to assemble themselves to the number of three without being dispersed.

Stamped paper must be used for all contracts, costing eight dollars per sheet; flour is taxed ten dollars and fifty cents per barrel from the United States and two dollars and fifty cents from Spain, and the rich only can eat flour while the poor eat cassava-root.

The culture of wheat, which grows luxuriantly, is restricted. Breadstuffs from the United States are excluded or burdened with heavy duties for the benefit of Spanish producers.

Ice is monopolized by the government and fishing on the coast is forbidden, being also a government monopoly.

The captain-general and his stewards levy taxes and contributions at their pleasure, amounting now to more than sixty millions per annum. With this revenue the government keeps an army of fifty thousand Spanish or Peninsula troops on the island, pays a vast number of officials, part of the clergy, half the entire Spanish navy, and many officials of rank at home in the mother country, and the surplus, if any, is remitted to Spain and expended on matters entirely foreign to the interests of the island.

Is it unnatural that a social gulf, deep as an unfathomable abyss in the Alps, has for ages divided the Cuban from the Spaniard? What an Iliad of woes in this richest territory on the face of the globe—a paradise by nature made a hell by the Spaniard. Was ever the oppression of the American colonies by the British government equaled by one hundredth of the oppression inflicted for centuries upon the unfortunate colony of Cuba? The forms at least of civil government prevailed in our Colonies, and the protection of life and property were at least asserted in the equal laws of Parliament. In Cuba the only government is a military despotism, where the fate of all life and property ever hangs in the uncertain balance of an arbitrary will and from whose decree there is no earthly appeal. Upon remonstrance the British Parliament alleviated the taxation of our Colonies until the duty on tea alone remained the most obnoxious imposition. In Cuba everything is taxed, without precedent or propriety, and the burden of the imposition is only graduated by the ability of the subject to pay the extortion, with no cortes or parliament to appeal to for even temporary justice or alleviation.

The principle that taxation and representation are inseparable in any just government impelled our fathers into a revolution by formal declaration on the 4th of July, 1776. Impelled by the same conviction that taxation and representation are inseparable, and goaded by the iron of tyranny piercing their flesh at every turn, the patriots of Cuba declared their independence from the thralldom of Spain on the 10th of October, 1868, at Manzanillo, and submitted to the God of their conscience, and all civilized nations, the asseverations of their patriotic purpose.

Who can declare in the face of this free nation that dates its liberty from the rebellion of its fathers, and without doing violence to the truth of our own history, that the people of Cuba have a less righteous cause for freedom and independence than we had in 1776?

Sir, any change from a military despotism will be for the good of a people so mysteriously cursed in this omnipotent toleration by a common Creator, and the generous American people have for years been convinced that the independence of Cuba will alone secure the universal disenthrallment of this island and relieve the United States from a constantly threatening danger of collision with Spain herself.

The second proposition in the preamble is capable of incontrovertible establishment:

> The people of Cuba have declared themselves free and independent of the government of Spain, have established a government for themselves and abolished negro slavery, and for more than five years have successfully resisted all the efforts of Spain to reduce them to submission and re-establish the condition of negro slavery in that inland.

The revolutionists, headed by Carlos Manuel de Cespedes, an able lawyer and wealthy planter, raised the standard of revolt on the 10th of October, 1868, and issued their declaration of the justice and determination of their cause.

A few extracts from the memorable instrument I beg the House to hear:

> In arming ourselves against the tyrannical government of Spain we must, according to precedent in all civilized countries, proclaim before the world the cause that impels us to take this step, which, though likely to entail considerable disturbances upon the present, will insure the happiness of the future.
> It is well known that Spain governs the island of Cuba with an iron and blood-stained hand. The former holds the latter deprived of political, civil, and religious liberty. Hence the unfortunate Cubans being illegally prosecuted and thrown into exile, or executed by military commissions in times of peace; hence their being kept from public meeting, and forbidden to speak or write on affairs of state; hence their remonstrances against the evils that afflict them, being looked upon as the proceedings of rebels, from the fact that they are bound to keep silence and obey; hence the never-ending plague of hungry officials from Spain to devour the product of their industry and labor; hence their exclusion from public stations and want of opportunity to skill themselves in the art of government; hence the restrictions to which public instruction with them is subjected, in order to keep them so ignorant as not to be able to know and enforce their rights in any shape or form whatever; hence the navy and standing army which are kept upon their country at an enormous expenditure from their own wealth, to make them bend their knees and submit their necks to the iron yoke that disgraces them; hence the grinding taxation under which they labor, and which would make them all perish in misery but for the marvelous fertility of their soil. On the other hand, Cuba cannot prosper as she ought to, because white immigration, that suits her best, is artfully kept from her shores by the Spanish government. And as Spain has many a time promised us, Cubans, to respect our rights, without having hitherto fulfilled her promises; as she continues to tax us heavily, and by so doing is likely to destroy our wealth; as we are in danger of losing our property, our lives, and our honor under further Spanish domination; as we have reached a depth of degradation unutterably revolting to manhood; as great nations have sprung from revolt against a similar disgrace after exhausted pleading for relief; as we despair of justice from Spain through reasoning, and cannot longer live deprived of the rights which other people enjoy, we are constrained to appeal to arms to assert our rights in the battle-field, cherishing the hope that our grievances will be a sufficient excuse for this last resort to redress them and secure our future welfare.
> To the God of our conscience and to all civilized nations we submit the sincerity of our purpose. Vengeance does not mislead us, nor is ambition our guide. We only want to be free, and see all men with us equally free, as the Creator intended mankind to be. Our earnest belief is that all men are brethren. Hence our love of toleration, order, and justice in every respect. We desire the gradual abolition of slavery with indemnification; we admire universal suffrage, as it insures the sovereignty of the people; we demand a religious regard for the inalienable rights of man as the basis of freedom and national greatness.

During the first month of the war a provisional government was organized at Bayamo, and on the 10th of April, 1869, a convention met at Guaimaro of the delegates of the different sections of the island, where a constitution was considered and adopted. Their constitution is similar in all essential features to any of the free constitutions of our States, and by article 24 slavery is forever abolished, and all the inhabitants of the republic of Cuba are declared absolutely and forever free.

For more than five years the Cubans have successfully resisted all the power of Spain to reduce them to submission, and more than five hundred and sixty-eight engagements have been fought, many of them it is true of small proportions and inconsiderable damage, while again scores of battles have been fought where from 100 to 800 were left dead upon the field. At the battle of Cubitas 300 Spaniards were killed and 500 wounded, and 160 Cubans killed and wounded. At Guantanamo 1,200 Spaniards and 133 Cubans were killed and wounded. In March, 1874, the Spansh General Arminan was defeated at Guasinias by General Maximo Gomez in such a disastrous manner that he fell back to Puerto Principe with scarcely a single man of his column five thousand strong.

The constitution and laws passed by the house of representatives, notwithstanding all the contrary statements by the enemies of free Cuba, continue to rule as regularly as can be expected from an infant republic whose twofold difficulties simultaneously are the institution of itself and the fighting of its opponents, and the latest information shows that the Cubans hold their own from Santiago de Cuba to the district of Cinco Villas, over more than half the territory of the island. Wherever the patriot soldiers sweep they leave terror and destruction behind them. To the Spaniard's plantation they carry irretrievable devastation, while to their slaves they carry the invitation to freedom which is as instantly embraced, for freedom even in the camp and dangers of the liberators is far dearer than that brutal bondage in which there is no emancipation save in welcome death.

The white and colored soldiers in the patriot army fight side by side for liberty, are not divided off into colored and white regiments, stand shoulder to shoulder in the same ranks, and in the number of commissioned officers are as many colored as white. One of the bravest and most successful generals in the Cuban army is a colored man, General Policarpo Rustan, called the "Hero of the East."

With 605,461 colored people on the island, 379,523 of them held as slaves, and this battle of freedom raging around them, the very flame and smoke of which offer them their only hope of deliverance, the bloody struggle must inevitably keep on increasing instead of diminishing, and all efforts of Spain to re-establish slavery on the old foundations once destroyed by the patriots must indeed fail, and unspeakable calamities will follow each unsuccessful attempt, until that day, whether immediate or remote, (for time works no interference with the providences of God,) when the shout of liberation shall arise all over the island and the chorus reaching our shores shall go swelling through the South like an army of angels making music with their wings.

The third preamble is so susceptible of direct proof, that I shall content myself with a few references only and extracts from official documents:

> The war between Spain and Cuba has been and is now being conducted with a degree of barbarity shocking to all Christendom, and there is no reasonable prospect that Spain will ever be able to re-establish dominion over the people of Cuba.

The history of Spanish rule has ever been one of rapacity and cruelty in all her colonial possessions. Her peace is filled with violence and her wars with barbarity. From the treacherous murder of Incas and Montezuma to the last dastardly assassination of Captain Fry and his companions, her record is one of continual blood and inhumanity. She commenced on one line of policy in 1850 with the wholesale execution of Lopez and Crittenden and their followers, and has not swerved from it to the present day. Cubans taken prisoners are butchered on the battle-field, and Americans or foreigners captured in actual or constructive hostility are summarily executed as pirates, in violation of all civilized rules and international law. In January, 1869, the Spanish soldiers inaugurated a reign of terror in Havana, assassinating at theaters, in coffee-houses, and in the streets men, women, and children. In March three hundred persons of the best Cuban families were exiled to the island of Fernando Po, where more than half of them perished from cruelty and privation. In February, 1870, in Santiago de Cuba, eighteen prominent, rich, aged, and peaceful persons were executed without trial. During the year 1870 it is estimated that ten thousand unarmed and peaceful Cubans were shot by the Spaniards. In January, 1871, Colonel Alvear's Spanish troops murdered the ladies and children of the distinguished Mola family, whom they found on a plantation. In November the military authorities arrested and executed eight boys and condemned others to the chain-gang for the alleged offense of desecrating the grave of Castanon while as medical students they were playing in the cemetery.

The civilized world stood aghast at this incredible inhumanity. Behold the horrid picture, as drawn by Senator Benot in the Spanish Cortes itself:

Most of you, my lords, are fathers. Picture to yourselves in your mind's eye your sons being absent from the university of Havana in consequence of the absence of a professor, going in a spirit of boyish light-heartedness to a neighboring cemetery to play. Imagine for this irreverence, and a certain want of confidence that existed in the authorities, a ferocious and riotous mob taking your sons prisoners, subjecting them to a council of war, accusing them falsely of injuring the tombs. Imagine again the council of war acquitting them, and this savage rabble, worked up to a pitch of paroxysm at human blood being denied it, subjecting your innocent sons, after they had been acquitted, to another council of war, and there, at the point of the bayonet and under the fears inspired by the howls of these blood-thirsty hyenas, there condemning eight of your sons to death and the rest to the chain-gang! The children numbered forty-four, and the second council of war ordered them to draw lots who should die. Among the others it fell to the lot of two brothers, and the stony hearts of the judges even thinking it hard to deprive a father at one blow of both of his sons pardoned one of them; but in order that the number should remain correct they substituted for the pardoned boy another, because he happened to be somewhat older than the rest, without seeing or caring that they were breaking the heart of another father by murdering his innocent son—so innocent indeed that he had not even been in Havana on the day of the alleged demolition of the tombs. What should you say, O upright senators, who have grown gray in the administration of justice, if one of your sons had been condemned to death and shot like a dog for the fearful crime of being a little older than his unfortunate companions? Would to God that the bitter tale were hidden from all the nations of the earth!

In January, 1872, Captain-General Valmaseda issued a proclamation that every male person found away from his home should be shot, the women, if white, be put in prison and banished, and, if colored, to be condemned to the chain-gang for four years. In April Colonel Morales captured a place where twenty-five women, ten children, and six old men were living peacefully, and executed them all. During the year 1872 it is estimated that four thousand unarmed persons were shot by the Spaniards. In November, 1873, the American ship Virginius, with one hundred and fifty-six men on board, was captured by the Spaniards. Out of this number four were instantly shot without trial, and forty-nine more after a mock trial, and in utter violation of our treaty with Spain, were shot within a little more than one week after their unlawful capture on the high seas. Persons are tried and sentenced to death while absent or out of the country, children are immolated, judgment is passed upon the dead, the innocent suffer for the guilty, human ears are fried and eaten, and the only power is that of brute force in the lawless service of tyranny and plunder.

SANTIAGO DE CUBA, November 15, 1873.

MY DEAR FRIEND AND BROTHER: I know you will pardon me for not answering your letter of last April, in which you desire "full information in regard to the massacre of the Grand Lodge of Santiago de Cuba and the present condition of their widows and orphans." When your letter was received it had the appearance of having been opened. This fact and the contents of the letter convinced me that if the reception of the letter by me was known by the governor, my life, in spite of my high official position, would not be worth a moment's purchase. I immediately burned the letter, and, beyond my usual correspondence on business-matters, have not thought it advisable to touch on matters and things of our unhappy island, much as I should have desired you to have the horrible facts to present them to the Grand Lodge of New York at their last sitting. But this, you know, was impossible, as every mail was searched, and life here is held of no value whatever. But the affairs of the last few days and the savage acts of the volunteers have compelled many to leave here secretly, as there is no knowing where this will all end, and by this mode I send this letter, though when it will reach you, God only knows.

The Grand Lodge in 1869 met here, as was their custom since their organization. They had never been disturbed by the government, although their time and place of meeting were well known to all of us. The night before the meeting I was informed that the arrest was to be made, and that, should there be any resistance on the part of the tyler to the free entrance of the officers, the troops were to fire into the building and burn it, with all those within. I personally informed the Grand Lodge of these intentions, and the next morning learned that they intended to hold their session with open doors. They did so, and were arrested and that night confined in the jail. The next morning they were informed that they should be taken to Havana for trial; but three hours after sunrise they were all taken outside of the city and shot. This act created considerable excitement at the time, but, as it was imprisonment to speak of it, it was soon hushed up.

The families of those men thus shot were placed on trial for the act of the heads of those families, and, as a result, their property was confiscated; they were declared, paupers, and at the same time the populace was forbidden, under pain of imprisonment, to render any of them any assistance. Thus, being deprived of home and shelter, food and the means of obtaining it, forbidden to leave the jurisdiction of Santiago de Cuba, these poor, helpless creatures sought shelter in the woods near here, and became one common family.

But the inhumanities, cruelties, and barbarities which these women and children have been subjected to passed the belief of a civilized being. I could not describe what I have seen and been unable to prevent. All robberies are laid to their door, and even supposed robberies were gotten up, so that the chase of the blood-hound might be witnessed by the rabble, and the suffering of some one of the poor beings added to their thirst for morbid depravity. It was not two months after the executions that I saw one of the women, who was about to become a mother, placed between two boards, upon which sat a heavy, burly savage, surrounded by a dozen soldiers and several officers, who were trying to compel this helpless being to confess a crime of robbery which I had previously investigated, and could find nothing that warranted the belief of a robbery having been committed. Her dead body was left there, and, four days after, when the stench compelled its burial, it was found to have been partly devoured by dogs. Since that time to the present these poor creatures have been subjected to outrages beyond description or comprehension by the people of a community such as you live in.

ONLY A FEW LEFT.

There are now but few living, perhaps thirty to forty souls, though in 1869 they numbered in all over three hundred. Some died from starvation, others from exposure, while the majority of them were killed by blood-hounds, for it is one of the sports of these brutes to hunt these poor people as game. I have seen bodies of those thus killed whose sex could not be distinguished by reason of mutilation. An attempt to exterminate them was made a few days ago by the volunteers and some of the crew of the Tornado. When the Virginius was brought into the harbor it was made the occasion of great festivities, and liquor flowed freely. Toward midnight a party of three men, with hounds to hunt their victims, started for the woods. No one dared to prevent what it was known would follow. The next morning they boasted in the streets of what had taken place, and related with pride and pleasure the violence to which they had subjected these women and girls, some of the latter being only ten years old.

BURYING NINE VICTIMS.

With an associate official, we that afternoon proceeded into the woods, and ordered the burial of nine whom we found dead. Seven were suffering from violence that I cannot describe; one was black in the face, she having been choked to death, while another had her entire breast bitten off. I returned, sick at heart, unable to render the slightest assistance, though I had been compelled to look on with apparent indifference.

By means of negroes we render them what assistance we can. Clothing we cannot send, as this might be identified, but food and medicines we have so far been able safely to send through slaves, who have more pity for these beings than they who once shared the bounty and hospitality of those they now persecute.

I need not ask you to keep my name to yourself. You know where all the proof can be had of this and other matters. I have not gone into the matter in the full detail that the case deserves. If the people in the United States should petition their Government to give the moral influence of some kind of protection, the money could easily be had to either take them out of the country or provide for them without any expense to the community. In God's name, do what you can for humanity.

The Secretary of State, in a dispatch to the Spanish minister, October 13, 1869, says that the civil war in Cuba has continued for a year; battle after battle has been fought, thousands of lives have been sacrificed, and the result is still in suspense; and the minister is reminded of the frequency with which, in the interest of humanity, he has been obliged to remonstrate against the atrocities and cruelties which have attended the conflict in Cuba for the last year. The principle of neutrality has controlled the proceedings of the Administration, he says, with regard to the war in Cuba; but he cannot admit the indefinite protraction of a conflict such as has existed for the past year in that island, a conflict marked with cruelties, destruction, and devastation without parallel in modern civilized warfare.

The American minister at Madrid reminded the Spanish minister of state that this Government had before remonstrated against certain proclamations of the captain-general of Cuba that threaten a mode of warfare at variance with the recognized customs of civilized nations; and he protests with all solemnity, in the name of the President of the United States, against the deplorable excesses which have thus far characterized the war in Cuba, and insists, in the name of humanity, while hostilities are prolonged, that the war shall be conducted in a manner more in accordance with the humane and Christian sentiments of the age. For nearly a year the insurgents have maintained themselves against all the forces which Spain and the Catalan volunteers have been able to put into the field against them. In the judgment of the President, in which the whole civilized world will coincide, the time has come, he says, when this struggle shall be carried on in a more humane way. To shoot prisoners of war simply because they are taken with arms in their hands is not in accordance with the custom of the Christian world. We have a right on our part to insist that Spain shall carry on this war hereafter in a manner more in accordance with the humane and Christian sentiments of the age. And the Secretary of State, Mr. Fish, in his dispatch of November 12, 1873, to our minister, Mr. Sickles, declares that such wholesale butchery and murder are almost incredible; that it would be wholly incredible but for the bloody and vengeful deeds of which Cuba has been the theater, and that no government deserves to exist which can tolerate such crimes.

The fourth and last preamble of the resolution is as follows:

In consequence of the proximity of the seat of war to the United States the war has been and is injurious to the interests of the people of the United States, and it is evident that a prolongation of the contest will result only in great suffering and bloodshed, to be followed by the ultimate recognition of the independence of Cuba by Spain herself.

The proximity of the island of Cuba to our own country, commanding as it does the approach to the Gulf of Mexico and barring the entrance to the Mississippi River, which drains half of the North American continent and is the great highway of commerce of the Western States of this Union, forces the question of its condition and destiny upon our most serious consideration and invests this question with interests peculiarly American.

This island keeps watch at the door-way of all our Mississippi, Gulf, California, and South American commerce, and nature and necessity will ever demand that it shall be the friend and ally of the United States, and its enemy never.

The prolonged war in this important and neighboring island has been and is injurious to the interests of the people of the United States, and its indefinite prolongation, with all its destruction of productive industries, its horrors and barbarities, must be firmly discountenanced, for the potent voices of humanity and commerce demand it. What greater agencies controll the destiny of nations than the Christian sentiments born of a common humanity, and the interests of trade which marshals the money of the world? Under the present war of extermination and ruin, as it draws its bloody length along from year to year, with neither conquest on the one side nor independence on the other, no nearer success than five years ago, American citizens are suffering in life and property, and the treaty obligations to this country are violated with daily defiance and thus far with impunity. We desire no hostile attitude between the United States and Spain, and only from a sincere regard for the mutual interests of peace do we desire a speedy termination of hostilities in this unhappy island, and in the light of the past experience and the unconquerable difficulties in the future it would seem that the Spanish Cortes itself must see that this war can only be a fearful waste of blood and treasure for a time, to end at last with exhaustion and the expulsion of its flag from this Gem of the Antilles.

Torn by civil war and contending armies, with no established form of government or fixed rule at home, how can Spain have any reasonable hope to subdue this revolution in Cuba? Can it be expected that the republican governments in this hemisphere will have more regard for the pride of a decayed monarchy or an insincere and insecure republican dictatorship in Europe than for their own sense of justice and political and commercial interests?

All nations steer their policy by the compass of national interest. European diplomacy is nothing but a network of self-interest, frequently torn by mighty wars but quickly repaired by the oft-renewed treaty, and thus treaties, intrigues, and wars hold their perpetual successions, like the rotations of the seasons. Our hemisphere has no such network of international dangers. With a simplicity and uniformity of government in every portion of it, and entangling alliances with no European systems, our national existence may ever be characterized by the successful study and fruition of the highest happiness attainable by the science of government.

But can the United States be indifferent to an indefinite protraction of this contest in Cuba? Has its continuance for five years been injurious to the interests of the United States? In the statesmanship of every country two questions are always prominent, and cannot be exceeded by any other considerations, that of national safety and national revenue. The preservation of our institutions, and the extension and protection of our trade are the vital organs in the body of our country's welfare itself, and these being more directly under the guardianship of the representatives of the people demand our first solicitude and maturest reflection.

The interests of a country consist not alone in the profits of business, and the collection and disbursement of its revenues, but also in the contentment of its people, in the uncompromising protection of their rights abroad, in the undoubted power and disposition of its government, and in the respect and inviolability of its flag upon all the waters of the globe.

All of these interests of the United States have suffered most injuriously, and must continue to until the conclusion of this mad contest in the very pathway of our commerce and on the very threshold of our bordering sea of the south.

The danger confronting us is an outburst of hostility at any moment between the United States and Spain, and all on account of complications arising out of the present condition of Cuba and our inseparable relations with that island. To avert this danger, which is not appalling to our power, only discordant to our cherished policy of peace, the early tranquillity of this island is a question for our serious contemplation. As lovers of our country, we will at least not hesitate to initiate the process of pacification, or, better still, the peaceful process of independence in Cuba before we ourselves are drawn unwillingly into the vortex of war. But shall this pacification be secured by the defeat of liberty or the expulsion of despotism; by the triumph of the patriot or the victory of the ineffable tyrant?

Our obligations of amity and treaty have ever been scrupulously observed toward Spain through every administration of the Government to the present. Spanish citizens have not been molested nor their property disturbed; but so freely have they mingled in the enjoyments and rights of our institutions that their distinct presence has not even attracted our attention. If any complaint could be made it could only be at the excessive regard generally shown to the side of the Spaniard at the expense of our own citizens. So intense has always been our desire for amity and peace that in all differences between our citizens and the government of Spain since 1850, she received invariably the benefit of our indifference or our silent discrimination in her favor.

Charity flows from liberality, and magnanimity from strength, but there are moments in the life of nations as well as in individuals when charitable virtue must cease, and the preservation of vital interests can be no longer deferred. This I solemnly believe is the decisive moment in our relations with the Spanish government in the island of Cuba, when we should act in a spirit of no unkindness but firmness and fidelity for the security of our own safety and commercial interests.

This constant war and irritation in Cuba unfits the captain-general and his myrmidons from the calm consideration of all questions relating to the United States. Irresponsible as is this military despot, he suddenly aggresses upon our rights, violates our treaties, assassinates our citizens, and then pleads his want of power for reparation, and serenely refers the nations demanding redress to another hemisphere, to a disrupted government that may or may not at the time have a temporary head at Madrid. The captain-general has unlimited power for good or evil, but none for restitution, and the answer to all just complaints from the home government are only the repetition of excuses rendered by inferior officials to their superiors.

It ever has been, on the part of Spain, a disregard of justice to all friendly nations, to provide her representative in Cuba with such extraordinary powers, and in case of injuries to make no provision for prompt redress.

In 1851 nearly four hundred American citizens landed upon the shores of Cuba, under the leadership of Lopez, to assist the oppressed Cubans in an uprising for liberty. Their unfortunate fate is well known, having been captured and summarily executed. General Crittenden with a number of his companions, was also about the same time captured—not as soldiers, but unarmed—on the island of Contoy, belonging to Mexico, and after a mock trial before a military tribunal were basely murdered; and the gallant Crittenden, when ordered by the Spanish executioner to kneel down, exclaimed with indignation, "I kneel to none but my God."

Following close upon these outrages two American vessels, the Susan Loud and the Georgiana, were seized upon by the Spanish authorities while lying off the coast of Yucatan, and the officers and crew subjected to the most ignominious and inhuman treatment upon the suspicion that they were concerned in the Lopez expedition. Next, the Falcon, a United States mail-steamer, was fired into by a Spanish vessel without even a specious pretext. United States mail-bags were next forced open by the Spanish authorities, the mail overhauled and examined for the avowed purpose of preventing the reception and transmission of any communication or news except only such as the captain-general should deem proper. About the same time the United States steamer Crescent City was refused a landing at Havana with her passengers and mails because the purser of the boat was obnoxious to the Spanish authorities, by which act our postal and commercial arrangements were interrupted and our private citizens deeply injured. The United States Steamer Black Warrior was next fired upon by a Spanish war-steamer, the vessel siezed, and the property of our citizens for a time confiscated.

In this way from time to time has our flag been insulted and our confidence and friendship abused by a weak Spanish neighbor, toward whom we were ever just and indulgent in all our intercourse.

The consul-general at Santiago de Cuba informed the Secretary of State in June, 1869, that three American citizens were publicly shot without trial, having been taken prisoners at Ramon.

Speakman, a native of Pennsylvania, a perfectly innocent man, was cruelly murdered after the formality of a trial that amounted only to a farce. Mr. Cohner, the well-known American artist, was assassinated in the streets of Havana, in 1869, only in pursuance of that Spanish habit of insulting, plundering, and killing our citizens. The brutal butchery of Greenwald, because he was thought to be an American, and the treatment his dead body received, as well as the attempted assassination of other American citizens who were his companions, are yet well remembered by the country. In March, 1869, the American brig Mary Lowell was captured and condemned as a Spanish prize. This act was more in contravention of international law than even the seizure of the Virginius.

More recently the American steamer Aspinwall was seized by a Spanish war-vessel on the high seas upon the suspicion that she had arms and ammunition for the Cubans. She had no contraband goods on board, and was accordingly released after having been taken to Havana; but no reparation has yet been made, in answer to the demands of this government, for the wrong done to our commerce and the national flag.

And more recently the capture of the steamer Virginius on the high seas, carrying American papers and the American flag as evidence of her nationality, by the Spanish war steamer Tornado, and the hasty murder of fifty-three of her passengers and crew for no crime actually committed or known to international law, is still fresh in the minds of the people, and needs but this allusion at my hands.

But a few months ago a prominent citizen of my own State set foot on the island of Cuba in pursuit of his legal business, having been employed to attend to some embargoed interests belonging to his countrymen. Crossing through the island from Havana he reported himself at the office of the American consular agent at Nuevitas; whereupon both he and our agent were arrested by the Spanish governor, although the agent was subsequently released. But the undignified treatment of American official representatives in Cuba is not an unusual thing.

Only two years ago the American vice-consul at Santiago was compelled to seek safety from personal violence by seeking refuge on board of a French frigate, and the American consul-general at Havana received about the same time from the British naval officers the assurance of their protection and the offer of a file of marines to protect him whenever it became necessary to seek his safety on board a British man-of-war. A state of affairs in which such outrages can possibly occur is indeed but a smoldering magazine from which the explosion of war may come upon us at any hour in the day.

This maltreatment of our consuls and inhuman murder of our citizens is not only a wanton indignity to our Government, but is wholly in willful violation of the most solemn treaty stipulations.

Article 8 of the treaty of 1795 with Spain is as follows:

And in all cases of seizure, detention, or arrest for debts contracted, or offenses committed by any citizen or subject of the one party within the jurisdiction of the other, the same shall be made and prosecuted by order and authority of law only, and according to the regular course of proceedings usual in such cases. The citizens and subjects of both parties shall be allowed to employ such advocates, solicitors, notaries, agents, and factors as they may judge proper in all their affairs, and in all their trials at law in which they may be concerned before the tribunals of the other party; and such agents shall have free access to be present at the proceedings in such cases, and at the taking of all examination and evidence which may be exhibited at the said trials.

No language could be clearer or more comprehensive:

In all cases of offenses committed by any citizen within the jurisdiction of the other, the same shall be prosecuted by authority of law only, and according to the regular course of proceedings usual in such cases.

Need I say that our countrymen so ruthlessly slain in Cuba were for the most part captured on the high seas, without arms in their hands, and outside of the limits of Spanish jurisdiction; and when carried on land often no trial was had, no charges were preferred; while at others no examination or evidence was had, and the condemned were never permitted even to see the unusual and extraordinary tribunals that passed judgment upon them? In this way has American blood been wantonly shed in contempt of our flag and in foul treachery to the requirements of a mutual treaty.

To-day the fate of F. A. Dockray, an able, accomplished, and gallant citizen of my State, who was arrested at Nuevitas, is still undecided, one military tribunal having condemned him in violation of the safeguards of the treaty, though through the energetic interposition of our Government he will be accorded another trial, which I pray may result in his acquittal, for the prayers of a stricken father and agonizing mother are ascending hourly to Heaven for the preservation of their only child to comfort them in their old age.

Sir, it is not in human foresight to see how long this country and Spain can maintain peaceful relations with such a train of outrageous occurrences passing between them. It calls for the wisdom of both nations to devise a speedy remedy for a mutual extrication from this threatening dilemma. Our remedy lies in the passage of this resolution.

Wisdom and forbearance can devise nothing better. To this complexion it must come at last, and it were better that the American Congress now rise in moral grandeur and determination equal to the exigency, rather than that the coming year shall see another hecatomb of our citizens slaughtered in cold blood, shall behold our commerce crippled and our flag still more disgraced, only to be confronted at the next session by an inexorable necessity to take this very step.

Our commercial interests must suffer great injury by the indefinite continuation of this struggle in Cuba. Liberty and commerce preserve the life of the nation, as freedom and circulation the healthy life of the individual.

The best evidence of the progress of a nation is to be seen in the steady extension of its commerce, and its first signs of decadence in its shrinkage.

The commercial pursuits of this country have been steadily progressing, as seen by our gradual increase of American tonnage from 1,368,127 tons in 1815 to 5,353,868 tons in 1860, while during the war, for obvious causes, our tonnage decreased; but since the close of the rebellion we are again in the line of recovering our former proportion. Our foreign commerce has always been on the increase, and the loss of national tonnage did not retard the constantly increasing value of our exports and imports. In 1850 the value of this commerce was $330,037,038; in 1860, $762,288,550; and in 1873, over $1,300,594,864. With the exception of Great Britain the most important and valuable of our commercial exchanges is with the inexhaustible island of Cuba.

Our trade for 1873, excepting again Great Britain, with seven of the principal commercial countries; as rated by their exchange of products with the United States, represents their relative importance as follows:

China	$28,267,023
Japan	16,917,432
Italy	15,215,639
Spain	15,019,155
Russia	13,976,545
Austria	2,390,014
Total	91,785,808
Cuban trade	107,500,000

In a commercial point of view, then, our trade with Cuba alone is $5,714,192 greater than that of the six other of our best customers combined.

The following official table serves to show to what extent our shipping is engaged in the carrying trade of Cuba—more than double that of Spain, and more than fourfold that of England and France:

Entrance and clearance of vessels in the ports of Cuba during 1847.

Countries.	Entrance.	Clearance.
United States	2,012	1,722
Spain	819	751
England	563	489

The United States imported from Cuba in 1873 1,454,124,259 pounds of raw sugar, valued at $77,953,470; also 43,533,909 gallons of molasses, valued at $9,901,051; also 113,670,829 pounds of melada valued at $4,722,165; total, $92,500,000; and imported from all the rest of the world $19,072,920 of sugar and molasses. American ships alone carried 795,000 tons of this freight, and at the usual rate of five dollars per ton our shipping earned nearly $4,000,000 in the transportation of this one product of traffic between these two countries.

In 1873 the United States exports to Cuba amounted to more than $15,000,000, and estimating the inhabitants at about 1,200,000, the rate was over twelve dollars to each one of her population.

Our exports to Germany with its 45,000,000 of people were $61,767,997, or at the rate of one dollar and thirty-eight cents per head, and to France with her 38,000,000 of people our exports amounted to $33,000,000, or at the rate of less than one dollar per head.

The magnitude of our trade with Cuba may have escaped attention in our more eager gaze at the brilliant enterprise of bringing the fabulous wealth of the Orient through the golden gates of San Francisco, and yet the figures prove that our traffic with this island is more than twice as valuable as that of China and Japan combined.

Other nations, as wise and enlightened as we are, do not scruple to engage in war for no other purpose than really to open new avenues for commerce and to drain the source of new riches into their national coffers, and yet the United States Government hesitates to extend even the hand of moral fellowship to a people who individually are of more importance to this country in a commercial calculation than either the Chinese, Spanish, Germans, or French combined.

The English embark in war in Asia to compel an unwilling people to become opium-eaters for the benefits of the English treasury, and yet we, who are no better Christians, and not half as good political economists as our cousins across the Atlantic, shrink from speaking one word of recognition and encouragement to a brave people from whom we receive three-fourths of that indispensable article, sugar, consumed in this country, and who are self-sacrificing devotees to our own republican form of government.

Shall this Government stand by in stoic unconcern and witness the sure and gradual destruction of its important and essential commercial interests in Cuba, or shall we pass this resolution, a simple, peaceful act in itself, usual and rightful between nations, without cause for offense on the part of Spain, but which act will become an event, and will herald the not distant independence of Cuba as the stimulating sunshine of spring heralds the glorious harvest of the summer?

Our peace and vital interests require protection, but not by interference. The simple passage of this resolution will hedge our interests with all the potency they require, and develop others to a greatness unthought of before. Our policy is peace and protection. What the course of the British government would be under the like circumstances now surounding us may be easily inferred from their position held in 1821, and announced to the allied powers of Europe. They said no government was more prepared than their own to uphold the right of any state or states to interfere where their own security or essential interests were seriously endangered by the internal transactions of another state.

Again, it can easily be demonstrated that it is not among the posibilities of Spain, with all her superiority of arms and discipline and navy, to crush this spirit of independence in Cuba, or to subdue the present military opposition to her authority.

The decrepitude and unstability of Spain herself is the strongest proof in support of this assertion. With imperialism and democracy at war in the mother-country, and all probabilities so uncertain even that no reasonable prediction can be ventured upon the issue, where are the material and strength to come from for the ultimate subjugation of this heroic people? Ultimate even, for time brings legions and strength to the Cuban and weakness to the Spaniard.

Said Señor Garrido in the Cortes over a year ago:

The Cubans have the same right to administer their island as we have to govern and administer our provinces and local interests. Against tyranny there is always the right of rebellion, and we who for fifty years were always rising against despotism cannot deny the right of rising to those whom we ourselves oppress. You say you want twelve thousand more men to crush the Cuban insurrection; but this insurrection has already existed four years, and now you come and tell us that you want twelve thousand men to subdue it, besides the fifty thousand or more that you have sent already. I can tell you that the question of Cuba is for you an insoluble one; you may send your twelve thousand men there as you have sent many times twelve thousand already during the last four years, but you will not settle the question for all that.

Said Senor Eduardo Benot, in the Spanish senate:

We have lost in the Antilles thousands and thousands of brave soldiers; Cuba is the tomb of the Spanish youth, the grave of the Spanish army. What have we gained after all by wresting from the Cubans their inborn rights which, try as we may, must still be theirs? We have won the right of being held up as the most inhuman people in all civilization.

In 1869 General Prim stated to the Cortes that Spain had sent 34,500 men to re-enforce the army and navy in Cuba, and the whole Spanish forces employed in Cuba since the commencement of the revolution number over 107,400, from their own estimates. The Cubans commenced with a body of 147 armed men, and to-day have 17,250 well-armed men under an able and successful commander-in-chief, General Maximo Gomez, 3,000 of whom are an efficient and formidable cavalry, whom the Spanish soldiers describe as "men on horseback, without guns, fighting like devils."

In 1870, when the revolution was weaker than to-day, and when Spain had an established government and peace at home, Mr. Sickles, our minister at Madrid, informed our Government that the Spanish campaign in Cuba had failed, and that their great reliance was then on the thirty gun-boats lately built for Spain in the United States.

What has become of these 107,400 Spanish troops? The captain-general in his official report of 1869 accounts for 14,000 as having been lost by disease and battle during that year. In the absence of further official reports from this military functionary upon the subject, it may not be unreasonable to conclude that 14,000 at least followed each year in the same wake, which for the years 1870, 1871, 1872, and 1873 would amount to 56,000 more as mustered out by battle and disease.

When is it possible for Spain, disrupted in government and dishonored in credit, to send out 107,400 soldiers more for the conquest of disease and the patriots? Will it be when Don Carlos and Marshal Serrano shall meet in armistice and each contribute his quota of troops for the expedition?

Captain-General Jovellar lately resigned his position as governor of the island, being convinced that Spain cannot now, and I assert never can, furnish the requisite men and money to maintain her sovereignty in Cuba.

Sir, a people whose cause is just, once baptized in the blood of liberty, are ever invincible, and tyrants from all ages and nations can bear unwilling testimony to this truth. For seven years our fathers persevered amid the varying fortunes of war for the boon of liberty we, their descendants, now enjoy, and who will say that the devotion to independence is less intense in Cuba than it was in our Colonies, with all their superadded suffering and political degradation to nerve them on to victory or death?

It is not in Spanish power to again enslave this people, six hundred thousand white and six hundred thousand colored, who fight with such persistent desperation, whose commissary is the bountiful fruitage of a tropical clime, who have such inapproachable fastnesses for safe retreat and as a constant basis for renewing operations, and whose faithful ally in the destruction of their unacclimated enemies is that fearful scourge of the tropics, the yellow-fever.

The future of poor Cuba may yet be darkened for years with more blood and anarchy, which merciful Heaven forbid! but the final blessing upon all this martyrdom must come at last as certain as that immutable justice is an attribute of God.

Sir, the natural right of revolution is recognized by all international jurisprudence, and no cause for revolt more just than that of Cuba stands recorded in the annals of the world. If there ever was an occasion that justified a revolution, that called upon a people to recur to first principles and seek relief from the abuse of power by an appeal to arms, this was one. The spirit of resistance was not evoked by any question of abstract rights, but from actual suffering and grievous oppression in the administration of justice, in agriculture, in commerce, and in every pursuit of happiness.

Wars were formerly fought for families and dynasties, for the rights of thrones and the prerogatives of crowns; now men fight for written constitutions, for the rights of men and the prerogatives of nations, and fighting learn to govern for themselves.

Shall this brave people of both races who for nearly six years have been fighting for the creation of a new nation, and who in their final triumph will cease to be Spaniards as well as slaves, continue yet another year without one word of sympathy from us, simply because we brook the spontaneous expressions of our own hearts and judgments in most unnatural deference to the opinions of European monarchies?

The very fact that such powers are the enemies of liberty everywhere is the very reason why our great nation should be its friend. Monarchies are always swift in the recognition of new governments in political affinity with their own, regardless of the question of their birth, whether by statecraft, as Amadeus of Spain, by usurpation as Napoleon III of France, or by invasion and attempted conquest of a sister republic as Maximilian in Mexico. Shall we, from fear of European criticism or for want of moral stamina in the exercise of our prerogative, turn a deaf ear for another year to the crying appeals of liberty in Cuba, or shall we rather, imbued, as I know we are, express the same noble sentiments as uttered by the Father of his Country on the presentation of the French flag to our Government in 1796:

> Born in a land of liberty, my anxious recollection, my sympathetic feelings, and my best wishes are irresistibly excited whensoever, in any country, I see an oppressed nation unfurl the banners of freedom.

Why hesitate in this act of justice to a struggling nation who for six years have been fighting for their own liberty and for the freedom of over a quarter of a million slaves?

Who doubts that if France or Prussia or Holland had treated our revolutionary fathers with the same indifference and delay in the acknowledgment of their independence as the Congress of the United States has shown toward Cuba that George Washington and his illustrious compeers would have died ignominiously as traitors upon the scaffold, and their marble statues that now honor this Capitol would be unhewn blocks in the quarry and their monuments, like that of the adored Emmett, would yet be unsculptured and unepitaphed?

Benjamin Franklin, declining to receive back a sum of money which he had loaned to a poor and worthy man, upon tender of its payment exclaimed, "I do not need it; pass it round among other poor and worthy people who are in distress."

What was our condition and prospect of success before the sun of foreign recognition rose above the horizon of our Colonies? Says Hildreth, the historian:

> November, 1776.—Washington's army was by this time greatly reduced. The term of service of the militia was fast expiring. The whole flying camp soon claimed their discharge, and no inducement could procure a moment's delay. Some of the New York militia refused to do duty. Howe, they said, offered peace, liberty, and safety; so they understood his proclamation, and what more could be asked? The Continentals were enlisting for a year, and their term of service was fast drawing to a close; nor did they always wait to complete it, desertions being very numerous. Exclusive of the divisions of the highlands, and the corps under Lee on the east side of the Hudson, Washington's army did not exceed four thousand men.

In December Washington made the memorable retreat across the Delaware, while the principal cities of the country were one after the other falling into the hands of the enemy; and at the expiration of the year the same historian describes the following situation:

> The Howes issued a new proclamation. The speedy triumph of the mother-country seemed certain, and many persons, those especially of large property, including several who had taken an active part in the Revolution, hastened to make the required submission.
> Turkey, president of the late New Jersey convention, which had sanctioned the Declaration of Independence and formed the State constitution, now abandoned his country's cause and took a British protection. So did Allen and Galloway, late delegates from Pennsylvania to the Continental Congress. For ten days after the issue of the proclamation two or three hundred persons came in every day to take the oath.

At this critical juncture in our liberty's history the opportune recognition and friendship of France alone saved us from disintegration, defeat, and the ignomy of death on the scaffold.

Pass the blessing of liberty round through the hemispheres and the islands, wherever a gallant and worthy people strike and ask for it. Liberty sped from France to our shores upon the wings of their recognition of our independence. Let us speed liberty to Cuba upon the wings of the passage of this resolution, and the stars that this night keep watch over that bleeding island will sing the song of salvation in the morning, as the morning stars sang together over the birth of a Saviour at Bethlehem.

We, as a nation, are the beneficiaries of Providence, as was he to Franklin, who received a valuable favor at his hands. To have pocketed the money and been indifferent to worthy and distressed neighbors, would have stamped him with the moral crimes of theft and ingratitude.

To enjoy our freedom in arrogance and be indifferent to the distressed republic of Cuba, when by this simple recognition of their independence we could bless them as France and the other nations blessed us, would it not be undeservedly stamping this country as guilty of baseness and ingratitude without parallel in the annals of the Christian world?

No American colony ever achieved its independence without the friendly assistance of other nations.

Greece received material aid in armies and ships, even more than the simple recognition that Cuba pleads for, from the allied powers in Europe against Turkey. And this interference, not recognition only, is justified by our most authoritative commentators upon international law.

> The assistance that England gave to the United Netherlands when they were struggling against Spain, and the assistance France gave to this country during the war of our Revolution, were justifiable acts, founded in wisdom and policy. And equally justifiable was the interference of the European powers of France, Great Britain, and Russia, in favor of the Greeks against the Ottoman Porte, by the treaty for the pacification of Greece concluded by those three Christian powers in 1827, and by means of which a ferocious and destructive war was terminated by the independence of the Greek state as a new kingdom, and a recognition of that independence by the Ottoman Porte in 1832. So, also, there was a successful interference in 1840 of four of the European powers, Austria, Great Britain, Prussia, and Russia, in the civil war between the Ottoman Porte and Mehemet Ali, the Pasha of Egypt. And lastly, there was the memorable interference of the five great European powers in the Belgic revolution of 1830, which ended in the separation of Belgium from Holland, and the establishment of the same as an independent state.—Kent's Commentaries, volume 2, page 23.

The South American Spanish colonies for years before their independence was even recognized by Congress, received such assistance from the United States as was obtainable under the following instructions issued by President Madison on the 3d of July, 1815.

Cuba will be content with the same assistance and her independence would be assured under similar presidential instructions at this time, though I believe it is the imperative duty of Congress to accept the responsibility of this question and to inaugurate a new policy in our relations with Cuba which the Executive of the Government would faithfully carry out as the expression of the will of the people:

> There is no principle of the law of nations which requires us to exclude from our ports the subjects of a foreign power in a state of insurrection against their own government. It is not incumbent upon us to take notice of crimes and offenses which are committed against the municipal laws of another country, whether they are classed in the highest grade of treason or in the lowest grade of misdemeanor. Piracy is an offense against the law of nations, and every civilized government undertakes to punish the pirate when brought within its jurisdiction; but an act of revolt, a rebellion against a sovereign, must not be confounded with an act of piracy, which is denominated hostility against the human race.
> Any merchant vessel, therefore, which has not committed an offense against the law of nations, being freighted with a lawful cargo and conforming in all respects to the laws of the United States, is entitled to an entry at our custom-houses, whatever flag she may bear. She is also entitled to take on board a return cargo and to depart from the United States with the usual clearance.

The President desires that you will regulate your official conduct upon the principles that have been stated; but if any extraordinary case occurs, you will report it to this Department with all possible dispatch.

I am, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

A. J. DALLAS,
Secretary of the Treasury.

P. L. B. DUPLESSIS, Esq.,
Collector, New Orleans.

It may be asked what benefit will the passage of this resolution be to our struggling political brothers in Cuba, and wherein is their independence so surely to follow? Sir, ever since this struggle our country has been in the unmanly attitude of holding the Cuban down while the Spaniard is fighting him. We have long felt the meanness and unmanliness of our false position; but they say it is our treaty obligation to Spain that compels us to violate our conscience by opening our doors and stores to the Spanish slaveholder, while to the poor slave and the Cuban we must sell or give nothing, not even a cup of cold water or kind expression of sympathy. Shameful attitude in the eyes of our own self-respect! How must we, the giant and paternal republic of the New World, appear in the estimation of the weak but chivalrous republics of Mexico and South America, who long ago recognized the belligerent rights of the infant republic of Cuba?

Spain has all the privileges of trade and facilities in the ports of the United States, replenishes her war stores, and repairs her ships of war in American ports whenever necessity may demand; and with her thirty gun-boats, built but a few years ago for her in the United States, she has indeed every advantage, except in valor on an equal battle-field, over the Cubans, who are not allowed by the guardians of the law and the treaty to receive any instruments of warfare, either by purchase or contribution, from liberty-loving friends and sympathizers.

But the most ridiculous posture in which diplomacy has placed us is, that while we are stooping over to hold the poor Cuban on his back, and all in zealous and delicate fulfillment of the treaty, the haughty captain-general kicks us in the back, while his Catalan volunteer sticks a knife between our shoulder, and then blusteringly refers us to Madrid for apology or redress; and to Madrid we go only to find a government that stands more in awe of the captain-general than he does of it.

Under such humiliating circumstances what American does not admire the Roman spirit of that grand old Senator, Thomas H. Benton, who on the floor of the American Senate, in a debate upon the revolution for liberty in the Spanish South American provinces, said:

In such a case I declare it to by my sentiment that treaties are nothing, books are nothing, laws are nothing; that the paramount law of God and nature is everything; and that the American soldier, hearing the cry of helplessness and weakness, and remembering only that he was a man born of woman and the father of children, should fly to the rescue, and strike to prevent the further perpetration of crimes that shock humanity and dishonor the age!

With the passage of this resolution will come the proclamation of equal privileges and advantages in all ports and places within the United States. Impartial neutrality will then be observed by our Government between the Cuban and the Spanish belligerents, and equal liberties to pursue the operations of war and purchase military stores will be accorded to both parties. With this recognition will also follow an observance of the rules of civilized warfare on the part of Spain, and her now unchecked barbarities would cease, or interference would be justifiable on the part of enlightened nations as in the case of Greece in her war of independence against Turkey.

This would be placing the oppressor and the oppressed upon an equal footing, and nerved by love of liberty and valor, and cheered by the certainty of fair play, how long would it be before the prowess of the Cubans and the hosts of their friends who would spring out of the earth like the mailed warriors that sprang from the sowing of the dragon's teeth would plant the flag of victory over every rood of that glorious island.

Did not Mr. Webster, the ablest lawyer and most learned diplomatist, as Secretary of State, declare to the British minister, Mr. Fox, in 1841, as follows?

It is well known to Mr. Fox that authorities of the highest eminence in England, living and dead, have maintained that the general law of nations does not forbid the citizens or subjects of one government from taking part in the civil commotions of another.

But I am done. Whatever our action may be upon this resolution, while its passage would be like the outburst of the sun upon the mariner laboring for safety in a mighty storm, nevertheless the failure of its passage will not put out a single camp-fire of liberty on that devoted island. God and the American people will still keep watch over it, until the fullness of time shall bring it triumphantly into the family of nations. I believe this glorious time is not far distant, for the mills of the gods have ground slowly but surely for six years, and the upper and the nether mill stone will soon come together.

Under no possible contingency, without involving the interests and safety of the United States in constant jeopardy, can our Government much longer subordinate its sympathy and recognition of independence to the haughty behests of diplomacy, for the impulses of political and human nature toward this kindred people in Cuba are stronger than the webs of heartless diplomacy, and American patriotism stands ready to enthusiastically assume the responsibility.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, June 20, 1874.

The Senate met at eleven o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

On motion of Mr. SPENCER, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings was dispensed with.

SUSPENSION OF JOINT RULES.

Mr. WEST. I offer a resolution concerning the order of business and ask its immediate consideration:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the sixteenth and seventeenth joint rules of the two Houses be suspended for the residue of the present session.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

The joint rules referred to are as follows:

16. No bill that shall have passed one House shall be sent for concurrence to the other on either of the last three days of the session.

17. No bill or resolution that shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate shall be presented to the President of the United States, for his approbation, on the last day of the session.

WASHINGTON CITY AND POINT LOOKOUT RAILROAD.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 3025.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 3025) supplementary to the act entitled "An act to authorize the Washington City and Point Lookout Railroad Company to extend a railroad into and within the District of Columbia," approved January 22, 1873, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments. The first amendment was to strike out the following words from line 35 to line 42:

And that all the rights conferred by this act are to be exercised and enjoyed by said company only upon the condition that said company shall first remove all the work it has done toward locating its track between the Insane Asylum and the Potomac River, and on the further condition that it shall never locate or operate said road, or any part thereof, between said asylum and the Potomac River.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

And provided further, That said Washington City and Point Lookout Railroad Company shall construct its railroad in the county of Washington herein authorized so that wherever it shall cross any public road it shall cross the same by an overgrade or undergrade crossing, by bridge or tunnel, so as not to impede public travel upon said roads, and shall construct that part of said railroad along Rock Creek, in the valley of said creek, passing west of the P street bridge, by a tunnel through the hill west of said P street bridge; and said road crossings and said tunnel shall be located and constructed in accordance with plans and specifications to be first approved in writing by the engineer in charge of public buildings and grounds.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know anything about this bill; but I tried yesterday morning to have the Senate go to the Calendar of unobjected cases in order that we might with justice to all dispose of matters reported to which there is no objection. Now, in order to test the sense of the Senate whether it is willing to do that thing or not—not having any antagonism to this bill, which I know nothing about, but it may as well be tried on this bill as any other, because I shall only have one chance in seventy-three of getting the floor after this is disposed of—I move to postpone the present order and to proceed to the Calendar.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The bill is up already and I hope the Senator will allow it to pass.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senator from Nebraska will understand my motive; and that is that on some bill or other I wish the Senate to determine whether it will take up the unobjected cases in their order or not; and as this happens to be the bill that is up, I will not take time to debate, but I make this motion so as to know what the Senate wishes to do, to postpone this and all prior orders, and proceed to the Calendar of unobjected cases.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves to postpone the pending bill and proceed to the Calendar of unobjected cases.

Mr. BOREMAN. I have no objection to going to the Calendar; but it seems to me it is unfair to have merely the unobjected cases considered. There are some bills here to which there may be some objection that are as meritorious as others and that ought to be considered. I do not think this action ought to be so restricted as to confine it to unobjected cases. I have no objection to going to the Calendar and considering all cases in their order.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It seems to me that this matter was settled before the Senator from Vermont raised his point of order, and after action is had on this bill his motion will then be in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not make any point of order. I make a motion, in order to test the sense of the Senate, that we proceed to the unobjected cases on the Calendar.

Mr. ANTHONY. Has this bill been taken up?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It was before the Senator came in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont to postpone this bill and proceed to the Calendar of unobjected cases.

Mr. ANTHONY. Subject to morning business.

The motion was agreed to—ayes 27, noes not counted.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. ANTHONY. Are reports in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive morning business. Petitions and memorials are now in order.

Mr. FENTON presented the petition of the New York Women's Social Education Society, calling attention to the necessity of passing the appropriation of a conscience fund to the establishment and support of the Reform School for outcast girls in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented the petition of Charlotte A. von Cort, executrix of C. J. von Cort, praying compensation for the use by the United States Navy of his submarine torpedo shell and its appliances; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BOGY presented the memorial of S. W. Penyman and other delegates of the Indian Territory, remonstrating against the allotment of their lands and the apportionment of their funds as proposed by House bill No. 2143; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. DENNIS presented papers relating to the application of John V. Solaway for a pension; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM presented a memorial of Rev. Theodore D. Woolsey, late president of Yale College, Hon. Henry P. Haven, Hon. L. F. S. Foster, and 37 other highly influential and respectable citizens of Connecticut, asking aid for Joseph Ebierbing and his wife Hannah, Esquimaux survivors of the late Polaris expedition, on account of services rendered by Joseph, by which the Tyson party was saved; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

HARPER'S FERRY PROPERTY.

Mr. DAVIS. I present a joint resolution of the Legislature of West Virginia, asking that the property of the Government at Harper's Ferry, sold in 1869, be made available for water-power, &c. I ask that the resolution be read, and I want to make a very brief statement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution requiring and instructing our representatives in Congress to favor the passage of a bill to resell the water privileges at Harper's Ferry.

Whereas at a public sale under act of Congress held in the town of Harper's Ferry, county of Jefferson, West Virginia, in the latter part of November, 1869, of the water privileges at the said town owned by the United States, the said water privileges were bid in by a Mr. F. C. Adams, giving bonds and security at one and two years respectively to secure payments; and whereas the said bonds having matured and the said F. C. Adams having failed to comply with the agreement named: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Legislature of West Virginia, That as a means of affording relief to the citizens of said town and surrounding country, as well as to advance the interests of the State, our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives requested, to favor the passage of a bill authorizing the Secretary of War to resell the same.

Resolved further, That a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolution be transmitted by his excellency the governor of this State to the President of the Senate of the United States and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Adopted January 17, 1874.

A true copy from the rolls.

J. B. PEYTON,
Clerk of House of Delegates and Keeper of the Rolls.

Mr. DAVIS. Now I offer a resolution:

Whereas what is known as the Harper's Ferry armory property was sold at public sale in 1869 to F. C. Adams by direction of the War Department, and the entire purchase-money thereof has long since been due, but no part thereof has been paid; and whereas from the neglect of said property it is fast depreciating and being destroyed in value, to the pecuniary loss and suffering of the people of Harper's Ferry; and whereas a decree from the proper court has been granted for the resale of said property in order to obtain the purchase-money, with interest and costs: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be requested to proceed at once by all legal means to enforce the collection of the amount due the Government by F. C. Adams and his sureties on said purchase and to effectuate a resale of said property.

I ask for the present consideration of the resolution. There is no objection to it.

Mr. WEST. Is that intended to be an instruction to the Attorney-General to resell that property?

Mr. DAVIS. It is to collect the money in the most speedy way. The property was sold in 1869 and has been going to destruction since. The parties who bought it, instead of complying with the terms of the sale, have done nothing to comply with them, and the property now belongs to the Government and is fast going to destruction. No part of the purchase-money having been paid, this resolution is to instruct the Attorney-General to proceed at once to make the money in the name of the United States.

Mr. WEST. And if he does make the money, what then?

Mr. HOWE. What is the question before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Whether the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope it will be passed. It is important. I have consulted the Judiciary Committee in regard to it.

Mr. HOWE. We are executing a regular order now. I do not think we ought to waste the time in this way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the resolution will lie over.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I hope the Senate will allow this resolution to pass. I have looked into the matter for some years, and I know it is just and for the interest of the Government that this should take place.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will withdraw his objection. There will be no debate on this.

Mr. HOWE. Bills to which there was not the slightest objection have gone over already under objection, because Senators wish to go on with the Calendar.

Mr. DAVIS. I will state to my friend that this resolution——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask my friend to withdraw his objection. It is very important.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us have the regular order.

TRANSPORTATION REPORT.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives to print six thousand extra copies of the report of the Select Committee of the Senate on Transportation to the Sea-board, instruct me to report it back with an amendment and ask for its present consideration.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The amendment was to strike out all after the word "sea-board" and insert:

Thirty-six hundred copies of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, eighteen hundred for the use of the Senate, and six hundred for the use of the Select Committee of the Senate on Transportation to the Sea-board.

So as to make the resolution read:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed six thousand copies of the report, with appendix and evidence, of the Select Committee of the Senate on Transportation to the Sea-board, thirty-six hundred copies of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, eighteen hundred copies for the use of the Senate, and six hundred copies for the use of the Select Committee of the Senate on Transportation to the Sea-board.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was concurred in.

EDUCATIONAL REPORT.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the same committee to report back a concurrent resolution of the House to print twenty thousand copies of the report of the Commissioner of Education with an amendment.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The amendment was to make the resolution read:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed five thousand copies of the report of the Commissioner of Education for 1873, of which twenty-five hundred copies shall be for the use of the Commissioner, and twenty-five hundred copies shall be sold at the cost of paper and press-work, with an addition of 10 per cent., by the Congressional Printer.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was concurred in.

MARINE-HOSPITAL REPORT.

Mr. ANTHONY. The same committee, to whom was referred a concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives to print additional copies of the report of John W. Woodworth, supervising surgeon of the marine hospitals, have instructed me to report it back with an amendment and recommend its passage. The House resolution provided for the publication of five thousand copies of this report. The committee recommend that the number be reduced to one thousand and that they be for the use of the Treasury Department.

The resolution as proposed to be amended was read, as follows:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That the Government Printer be instructed to print one thousand copies of the report of John W. Woodworth, supervising surgeon of the marine-hospital service of the United States, for the year 1873, for the use of the Treasury Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was concurred in.

COURTS IN ALABAMA.

Mr. SPENCER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the order of business, No. 719, being a House bill relative to circuit courts of the United States in Alabama.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I rise to morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Alabama is out of order without unanimous consent. Is there objection?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I insist on the regular order.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I rise to morning business.

Mr. SPENCER. I have morning business, but I wish to preface it by making a statement. Two-thirds of the State of Alabama is to-day without any United States court whatever, and there is a bill on the Calendar, House bill No. 2246, relating to circuit courts of the United States for the district of Alabama, which will enable us to have a United States court during the vacation of Congress. It is reported from the Committee on the Judiciary. It is a terrible state of affairs for two-thirds of a State to be without a United States court, and I desire to call up that bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I make the point of order that the Senate has ordered that we proceed with the Calendar of unobjected cases, and until the order is discharged the Senator cannot make this motion.

Mr. SPENCER. In answer to the statement of the Senator from Vermont I will say that this bill is at the foot of the Calendar and there is no probability of its being reached if we go to the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama has a perfect right to ask the Senate to give him unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of the bill. That is all he did do. A single objection of course disposes of it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made. The Chair will receive reports of committees.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SPENCER. The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3757) for the transfer of twenty condemned bronze cannon for the erection of a statue to the late Major-General George Gordon Meade, have instructed me to report it back without amendment and ask the concurrence of the Senate. I desire to have the bill read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the bill will be read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Let it be read by its title.

Mr. SPENCER. It has a right to be read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I beg the Senator's pardon. Let the bill go on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the petition of Eliza Wells, administratrix, praying for an extension of the patent of Henry S. Wells for forming hat-bodies, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Allen B. Wilson, praying for the extension of patents No. 346 and 314, relating to sewing-machines, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of William H. Akins and Jacob D. Felthousen, praying for relief for inventing new and useful improvements in sewing-machines, reported adversely thereon, and asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. By consent of those members of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds who are present, as we shall not have another meeting, I report back the following bills without amendment and without recommendation:

A bill (H. R. No. 3761) directing the Secretary of the Treasury to report upon the necessity of a public building at the city of Auburn, New York; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3762) to amend the act entitled "An act for the erection of a public building for the use of the United States in Atlanta, Georgia."

Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, who were instructed by a resolution of the Senate of the 11th instant to inquire whether any further legislation is necessary to secure the transportation of the additional semi-monthly mail between San Francisco, Japan, and China, submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3611) for the relief of Nelson Green, reported it without amendment.

Mr. WADLEIGH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1410) fixing the salaries of the clerks at the United States armory in Springfield, Massachusetts, reported it without amendment.

Mr. BOREMAN, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2884) granting the right of way through the public lands to the Arkansas Valley Railway Company, reported it without amendment.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3628) for the relief of owners and purchasers of lands sold for direct taxes in insurrectionary States, and for other purposes, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance; which was agreed to.

Mr. PATTERSON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Emily Slaughter, praying to be allowed a pension, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that the petitioner have leave to withdraw her petition and papers for the purpose of presentation at the Pension Office; which was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. By request of a friend I ask leave to introduce a bill about which I know nothing.

Leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 960) for the relief of Theodore Valade, of Louisiana; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

STREET RAILWAY IN WASHINGTON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will now report the first bill on the Calendar.

The CHIEF CLERK. The first bill on the Calendar, resuming at the point where the Calendar was left off when it was last considered, is the bill (H. R. No. 2102) to incorporate the Capitol, North O Street and South Washington Railway Company.

Mr. SHERMAN. We have no time to consider that bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside and the next bill will be reported.

MINERAL LANDS IN MISSOURI AND KANSAS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2543) in relation to mineral lands.

Mr. BOGY. I wish to move an amendment to that bill.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I think it had better go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside.

COINAGE OF A TWENTY-CENT PIECE.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 468) authorizing the coinage of a twenty-cent piece of silver at the mints of the United States.

Mr. BOGY. I object.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I was going to ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. We considered it last year and came to a different conclusion from what the Committee on Finance do now. As it is purely a question of law as to discharging a surety, I think we ought to be allowed to reconsider it, with a view to see if we were right or our friends of the Finance Committee are.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks that this bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask unanimous consent, not to take time.

There being no objection, the bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask members of the committee if that is not one of the contested war claims for damages?

Mr. SCOTT. It is a case reported by the Senator from West Virginia for damages by occupation of real estate, for fire-wood, &c., furnished to the Army during its occupation of the country around Chattanooga. That is the nature of the claim.

PETER S. PATTON.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 753) for the relief of Peter S. Patton; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The preamble recites that in the month of March, 1872, the post-office at Burlington, Kansas, was burglariously entered and robbed of public moneys and property to the amount of $420; that such robbery was effected without fault or negligence on the part of the postmaster, Peter S. Patton; and that he has paid to the United States the amount and value of the moneys and property so stolen, and expended in the pursuit and arrest of the burglars the further sum of $100. The bill therefore provides for paying to Peter S. Patton $510 to reimburse him for the payments and expenses so by him made and incurred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SPRAGUE. My objection to that bill was simply that it constitutes a new officer. My belief was that an officer already in the service of the Government should be designated.

Mr. SHERMAN. The bill goes to the House of Representatives and they can amend it.

THE CALENDAR.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask unanimous consent that we may continue the Calendar for another hour, and, at the suggestion of Senators, that we take up the House bills. Several have suggested that we proceed with House bills only.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I object to confining it to House bills.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks unanimous consent to continue the Calendar another hour, confining it to House bills.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Let us say, "all unobjected cases," including Senate bills.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well; I will take that.

Mr. SHERMAN. I prefer that the motion be submitted in the usual form.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves to postpone the unfinished business and continue the consideration of unobjected cases on the Calendar for one hour.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CLAYTON. Is this for unobjected cases?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly, the same as before.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the Anthony rule, the Chair supposes. The next bill on the Calendar will be reported.

Mr. DAVIS. I inquire what will be the regular order after this hour expires?

Mr. SHERMAN. That is for the Senate to say.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business is the pension bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not so understand. I understood the pension bill was postponed with a view to take up the Calendar.

Mr. DAVIS. For one hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the motion to be in substance to continue the morning hour one hour.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That was the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The effect of which would be to leave the unfinished business as it would be if the Senate had proceeded with it at the end of the morning hour.

Mr. SHERMAN. To that I objected and moved that all prior orders be postponed with a view to continue the Calendar. I did not make a motion of this kind without having a purpose, and it was to get rid of the further discussion of the pension bill, which will necessarily in my judgment prolong the session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is at fault. The Chair heard no motion from the Senator from Ohio, but only the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Chair certainly put the motion of the Senator from Vermont, and that is what the Senate voted on. I wish to get rid of the pension bill, but I wish to do it squarely.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair submitted the motion made by the Senator from Vermont. That was the motion on which the Senate voted. The next bill on the Calendar will be read, being the bill (S. No. 331) providing for the construction of the Portland, Dalles and Salt Lake Railroad and Telegraph, and for the performance of all Government service free of charge.

Mr. INGALLS. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside. The next bill will be reported.

WATCH PRESENTED BY WASHINGTON TO MARQUIS DE LAFAYETTE.

Mr. HAMLIN. I hold in my hand a joint resolution which I think requires a little courtesy from this body, and I ask that I may be allowed to report it and put it upon its passage.

Mr. SHERMAN. What is it?

Mr. HAMLIN. It is a resolution which came from the House of Representatives authorizing the purchase of a watch which was a present from Washington to Lafayette. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Relations to report it back and recommend its passage, and I ask for its present consideration. I have the watch here in my possession.

There being no objection, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 113) making an appropriation for the purchase and restoration to the family of the Marquis de Lafayette of the watch presented to him by General Washington, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It appropriates the sum of $300, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the purchase and restoration to the family of the Marquis de Lafayette of the watch presented to him by General Washington, and lost by General Lafayette during his last visit to this country, such purchase and restoration to be made under the direction of the Secretary of State.

[During the reading of the joint resolution several Senators gathered around Mr. HAMLIN'S desk to examine the watch.]

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If it is in order I move that that watch lie on the table. [Laughter.]

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed unanimously.

STATUE TO GENERAL MEADE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next bill on the Calendar will be reported.

Mr. SCOTT. I desire now to make an appeal to the Senate in the same line as that which has just been responded to on the application of the Senator from Maine. A bill came from the House yesterday and was reported this morning from the Committee on Military Affairs, to donate twenty cannon for the statue of General George Gordon Meade. The gentlemen of Philadelphia who have that matter in charge have telegraphed me to procure its passage. I hope that these twenty cannon out of the hundreds captured by the Army under General Meade will not be denied for this purpose. I ask that that bill be put on its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Will you stop at that?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Very well.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 3757) for the transfer of twenty condemned bronze cannon for the erection of a statue to the late Major-General George Gordon Meade was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STATUE OF ADMIRAL FARRAGUT.

Mr. TIPTON. Now, inasmuch as we have provided for the statue of General Meade, I move that we proceed to the consideration of House joint resolution No. 59, for a statue of Admiral Farragut.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of the resolution indicated by him.

There being no objection, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 59) amending joint resolution of April 16, 1872, relating to a statue of the late Admiral Farragut, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to contract with some suitable and skillful sculptor for a bronze statue of the late Admiral Farragut, as authorized in the joint resolution of April 16, 1872, to be disposed of as therein directed. The selection of the sculptor or artist to execute the statue is to be made by the Secretary of the Navy, the General of the Army, and Mrs. Virginia L. Farragut, or a majority of them.

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds reported an amendment to strike out in line 9 the words "the General of the Army" and insert "the Admiral of the Navy."

The amendment was rejected.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House joint resolution (No. 59) has just been passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed the joint resolution in regard to the Farragut statue.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I do not ask for action now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion will be entered.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I move that the motion be laid on the table.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I ask the Senator to withdraw that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to lay on the table is not debatable.

The Chair put the question, and declared that the ayes appeared to prevail.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I desire to have a few moments' opportunity to explain——

Mr. SPRAGUE. Debate is not in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is out of order. The motion to reconsider is laid on the table, unless the Senator from Vermont demands a division.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I hardly think it is treating me handsomely, that being out of the Senate a moment this should have been taken up out of order——

Mr. SPRAGUE. Debate is out of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is laid on the table, and the next bill on the Calendar in regular order will be reported.

M. H. PLUNKETT.

The bill (H. R. No. 2801) to place on the retired list of the Navy M. H. Plunkett, late second assistant engineer of the regular Navy, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LANDS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. SPENCER. The next two bills on the Calendar, being the bill (S. No. 610) to authorize the correction of the boundaries of certain lands in California, and the bill (S. No. 611) for the relief of settlers on certain lands in the State of California, have been reported adversely.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They will be indefinitely postponed if there be no objection.

Mr. HAGER. These two bills I ask may remain on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They will be laid aside, remaining on the Calendar.

STATE OF GEORGIA.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 598) to refund to the State of Georgia certain moneys expended by said State for the common defense in 1777.

Mr. INGALLS. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside.

WILLIAM WHEELER HUBBELL.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 785) to settle for the inventions and patents of William Wheeler Hubbell.

Mr. LEWIS. I object.

Mr. RAMSEY and Mr. HAMLIN. That bill ought to pass.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. LEWIS. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside.

CITIZENSHIP OF INDIANS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 729) to enable Indians to become citizens of the United States.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside.

ABSENTEE SHAWNEE LANDS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 650) explanatory of the resolution entitled "A resolution for the relief of settlers upon the Absentee Shawnee lands in Kansas," approved April 7, 1869; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The preamble recites that several tracts of land ceded to the Shawnee Indians by the treaty concluded between them and the United States which was proclaimed November 2, 1854, were erroneously set apart and allotted to various individuals of the Shawnee tribe of Indians, and that these allotments were subsequently canceled, and therefore form a part of the residuum of the land which by the treaty was set apart for the Absentee Shawnees.

The bill therefore declares the terms of the resolution approved April 7, 1869, for the relief of the settlers upon the Absentee Shawnee lands in Kansas, shall be extended to those settlers who now occupy and have improved tracts of land known and described as the east half of the northeast quarter and the southwest quarter of the northeast quarter of section 29, in township 12, of range 23 east of the sixth principal meridian; the south half of the southwest quarter of section 5; the south half of the southwest quarter, the north half of the southwest quarter, and the northwest quarter of section 8, in township 13, of range 22 east of the sixth principal meridian, all located in the State of Kansas, within the boundaries of the tract ceded to the Shawnees by the treaty proclaimed on the 2d of November, 1854.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COLONEL E. M'CARTY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 352) for the relief of Colonel E. McCarty; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Colonel E. McCarty, of Illinois, assignee of Ruel Hough, the sum of $1,450, which Ruel Hough paid to the Government on a direct-tax sale by the judgment of a United States court, the tax on the land sold having been prior to the sale by the owner thereof.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with two amendments; the first of which was in line 10, before the word "prior," to insert the word "paid;" so as to read:

The tax on the land sold having been paid prior to said sale by the owner thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add the following proviso to the bill:

Provided, That the said Secretary is satisfied that said McCarty has succeeded to all the rights which said Hough had to make reclamation upon the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

It was ordered that the amendments be engrossed, and the bill read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

SETTLERS ON RAILROAD LANDS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3162) for the relief of settlers on railroad lands; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill provides that in the adjustment of all railroad land grants, whether made directly to any railroad company or to any State for railroad purposes, if any of the lands granted be found in the possession of an actual settler whose entry or filing has been allowed under the pre-emption or homestead laws of the United States subsequent to the time at which, by the decision of the Land Office, the right of the road was declared to have attached to such lands, the grantees, upon a proper relinquishment of the lands so entered or filed for, shall be entitled to select an equal quantity of other lands in lieu thereof from any of the public lands within the limits of the grant not otherwise appropriated at the date of selection, to which they shall receive title the same as though originally granted. And any such entries or filings thus relieved from conflict may be perfected into complete title as if such lands had not been granted; but nothing herein contained is in any manner to be so construed as to enlarge the grant to any such railroad; and this act is not to be construed so as in any manner to confirm or legalize any decision or ruling of the Interior Department under which lands have been certified to any railroad company when such lands have been entered by a pre-emption or homestead settler after the location of the line of the road and prior to the notice to the local land office of the withdrawal of such lands from market.

Mr. SPRAGUE. That bill is all right.

Mr. STEWART. It ought to pass.

Mr. HAGER. I have some amendments to offer which are not objected to by the committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the bill be considered subject to objection, for if we are to have new matter inserted we must reserve the right to object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be considered subject to objection.

Mr. HAGER. My first amendment is to insert after the word "lands," in line 13, the words "not mineral."

Mr. WINDOM. There is no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAGER. The next amendment is on page 2, line 20, after the word "railroad," to insert "or to extend to lands reserved in any land grant made for railroad purposes;" so as to read:

That nothing herein contained shall in any manner be so construed as to enlarge the grant to any such railroad, or to extend to lands reserved in any land grant made for railroad purposes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have that read again and explained.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What does that mean?

Mr. HAGER. I will state to the Senator that in the act granting lands for the construction of the railroad from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean certain exemptions are made. These words are to be found in section 3 of that act, granting lands "not sold, reserved, or otherwise disposed of by the United States, and to which a pre-emption or homestead claim may not have attached at the time the route of said road was definitely fixed." The object is not to give new lands in place of those that were reserved by section 3. With this provision, in case they are entitled to new lands, I presume they would be entitled to those that are really exempted by the act itself. It is for the benefit of the country, for the benefit of the Government, and not for the benefit of the railroads that I propose this amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am a little shy about these bills, because I do not understand them; but I will move to amend the bill by inserting after the word "enlarge," in line 19, the words "or extend," and striking out the word "the" and inserting "any;" so that it will read:

That nothing herein contained shall in any manner be so construed as to enlarge or extend any grant to said railroad.

Mr. WINDOM. I have no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. It was ordered that the amendments be engrossed and the bill read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

ROBERT COLES.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 214) for the relief of Robert Coles; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The preamble recites that it appears that, according to the laws of the State of Iowa, Robert Coles is the rightful owner of swamp land indemnity certificate numbered 92, for 2,383.26 acres, dated March 28, 1872, and indemnity certificate numbered 93, for 36.36 acres, dated April 15, 1872; that the list of swamp selections made in the year 1858, upon which proof for indemnity, under act of March 2, 1855, was submitted to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and was filed for action there on June 20, 1860, and the list of selections was approved by the surveyor-general of the State of Iowa, as appears from his letter to the county judge of Lucas County, in said State, dated March 3, 1859; that had this list of selections been certified up to the Commissioner of the General Land Office at the time of the approval, there were large bodies of vacant public lands upon which indemnity certificates could have been located; and that at the time the foregoing indemnity certificates were issued there were no vacant public lands in the State of Iowa upon which the same could be located. The bill therefore empowers Robert Coles to locate the indemnity certificates numbered 92 and 93 upon any of the unsold public lands subject to entry at $1.25 per acre, or one-half the number of acres thereof upon lands subject to sale at $2.50 per acre, or any number of acres thereof. And upon the return of the indemnity certificates numbered 92 and 93 to the General Land Office, the Commissioner is required to issue a patent for the lands so located to Robert Coles, his heirs or assigns.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NATHANIEL P. HARBEN.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 522) for the relief of Nathaniel P. Harben, of Georgia.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let that go over.

Mr. SCOTT. Before it does go over there ought to be an amendment offered changing the amount. However, let it go over for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside.

BELLE E. HAMMOND.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 416) for the relief of Belle E. Hammond, of Closter, Bergen County, New Jersey, reported adversely from the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be laid aside.

PEABODY SCHOOL IN SAINT AUGUSTINE, FLORIDA.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 782) to grant a site for the Peabody School in Saint Augustine, Florida.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill has heretofore been considered and amended, and an amendment is now pending.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the bill and amendment be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The bill, as amended, reads:

Be it enacted, &c., That the western part of the lot of land in Saint Augustine, Florida, lying at the corner of Tolamato and King streets, and now the property of the United States, the said part of said lot having a south front upon King street of two hundred feet, and a west end upon Tolamato street of one hundred and sixty-seven and three-tenths feet, a rear upon the north of two hundred feet, and an east end of one hundred and sixty-seven and three-tenths feeet, is hereby ceded, given, and granted to the board of education of the State of Florida, for the use of a public free school in the city of Saint Augustine, Florida, and to their successors; and the said board of education are hereby fully authorized to erect thereon such a building as in their judgment shall be for the best advantage of the school.

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect from its passage.

It is proposed to amend the first section by inserting:

Provided, That if at any time in the admissions to the school hereby established there shall be any exclusion on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, the grant hereby made shall determine and the property revert to the United States.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I object to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside.

JAMES L. JOHNSON.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1924) for the relief of James L. Johnson, surviving partner of Beck & Johnson, authorizing payment for Indian depredations.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let that go over. I remember that case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside.

JAMES PRESTON BECK.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1925) for the relief of James Preston Beck, administrator of Preston Beck, jr., authorizing payment for Indian depredations.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does that relate to the same subject, I ask the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BOGY. These two bills belong to the same subject.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I object. I did not know but that this last one was on another subject, and if so, I did not wish to object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside.

RAILROAD IN FLORIDA AND ALABAMA.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 608) granting the right of way through the public lands to construct and maintain a railroad.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to this bill?

Mr. CONOVER. I hope there will be no objection to the bill. It has been pending a long time, and is simply to grant the right of way through the public lands. It is a measure in which my State is particularly interested.

The bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Railroads with an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That the right of way through the public lands is hereby granted to Daniel P. Holland, the proprietor of the Jacksonville, Pensacola and Mobile Railroad, his associates, successors, and assigns, for the construction of a railroad in the States of Florida and Alabama from the present terminus of said railroad on the Apalachicola River, in the State of Florida, through the States of Florida and Alabama, to the city of Mobile, Alabama; and from a point on the line of said railroad to the city of Pensacola; and from a point opposite the corporate limits of the city of Jacksonville, on the Saint John's River, to the city of Saint Augustine, Florida; and the right, power, and authority are hereby granted to said Daniel P. Holland, his successors or assigns, to take from the public lands adjacent to the line of said railway, to the extent of one hundred feet in width on each side of the central line of said road where it may pass through the public lands, material for the construction and maintenance thereof; and the necessary grounds for stations and depots, or other necessary places, such as turn-outs and water-stations, are hereby granted to said Daniel P. Holland, his successors or assigns, to an amount not exceeding twenty acres for each ten miles in length of main line of railroad where it may pass through the public lands: Provided, That within one year from the passage of this act the said Daniel P. Holland, proprietor of the Jacksonville, Pensacola and Mobile Railroad, his successors or assigns, shall file with the Secretary of the Interior his acceptance of this act and a map of the routes exhibiting the line of the road.

SEC. 2. That said railroad shall be a post-route and a military road, and Congress at any time may fix rates of tariff for troops, materials of war, and mails, and may add to, alter, or amend this act.

SEC. 3. That all acts and parts of acts conflicting with this act be, and they are hereby, repealed.

Mr. THURMAN. The bill ought to be amended by making the license granted in it cease upon the completion of the road. Otherwise there would be a servitude of those two hundred feet that might interfere with the Government selling and making a good title to the property afterward.

Mr. CONOVER. I have no objection to any such amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Ohio state his amendment?

Mr. THURMAN. Let there be a proviso inserted in these words:

Provided, That the license hereby granted shall cease upon the completion of said road.

Mr. CONOVER. I do not want the license to cease on the completion of the road, for then they would have to tear it up again.

Mr. THURMAN. I will say "the right to take material shall cease upon the completion of the road."

Mr. CONOVER. I have no objection to that.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONOVER. I wish to amend in section 1, line 15, by inserting the words "or associates" and striking out the word "or," so as to read "his successors, assigns, or associates."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will inquire if there is any limitation in respect to the time within which this road is to be constructed or the right lapses?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Within one year.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have that clause read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That within one year from the passage of this act the said Daniel P. Holland, proprietor of the Jacksonville, Pensacola and Mobile Railroad, his successors, assigns, or associates, shall file with the Secretary of the Interior his acceptance of this act and a map of the routes exhibiting the line of the road.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That does not cover the point. I move to amend by adding as an additional section the following:

That if said railroad shall not be completed and put in operation within five years after the passage of this act all rights herein granted shall cease and determine.

Mr. CONOVER. I will accept that amendment. All I want is the right to build the road through the public lands.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment of the committee, as amended, was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REDEMPTION OF LANDS SOLD FOR DIRECT TAXES.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 806) to extend the time allowed for the redemption of certain lands by the first section of the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption and sale of lands held by the United States under the several acts levying direct taxes, and for other purposes," approved June 8, 1872, and to suspend the operation of the fourth section of said act; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill proposes to extend the time allowed in and by the first section of the act of Congress approved June 8, 1872, entitled "An act to provide for the redemption and sale of lands held by the United States under the several acts levying direct taxes, and for other purposes," for the term of two years from the 1st day of June next.

The second section suspends the operation of the fourth section of the act until the expiration of the term of two years from the 1st day of June.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish a verbal amendment made in line 9, section 1, to strike out the word "next" and insert in lieu of it "1874." The bill was drawn up in May last.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will inform my colleague that a similar bill extending this act one year has passed the House. This is a Senate bill and in all probability cannot be passed. I have no objection, however, to passing it in this form.

Mr. THURMAN. I would rather the bill should pass. There is a real necessity for it.

Mr EDMUNDS. I should like the Senator from Ohio to explain the point of this bill.

Mr. THURMAN, I can explain it in a moment. By the act approved June 8, 1872, two years were given to persons whose lands had been sold for direct taxes and purchased by the United States, and which are still held and owned by the United States under those tax purchases, and upon which the United States has granted no lien of any kind or parted with its claim in any manner, to redeem those lands by paying the full amount of taxes with interest and with considerable costs, too. The two years expired on the 1st of this present month. The object of this bill is simply to give those persons two years more in which they may redeem the lands.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In cases where the United States still hold the land?

Mr. THURMAN. Exactly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is confined to that?

Mr. THURMAN. Entirely.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no objection to that.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suppose the same exceptions are retained?

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WASHINGTON CROSSLAND.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 807) for the relief of Washington Crosland; which was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the payment to Washington Crossland, of Saint Louis, Missouri, the sum of $2,000, in satisfaction of all damages which accrued to him by reason of the construction of a railroad across his two lots of land in the city of Saint Louis by the United States for military purposes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there a report in that case?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the report read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report submitted by Mr. MERRIMON on the 13th of May:

The Committee on Claims, to whom were referred the petition and accompanying papers of Washington Crossland, of the State of Missouri, have had the same under consideration, and make the following report:

The petitioner presented his petition in this behalf to the Thirty-seventh Congress, and has been urging the same ever since that time. During the first session of the Thirty-ninth Congress the Committee on Claims of the Senate had the same under consideration, and made a report which embodies substantially the facts of the matter, and the same is adopted and made part of this report. It is as follows:

"The papers in this case show that in 1861 the military authorities of the United States built a railroad across two lots of the petitioner, situate in the city of Saint Louis, and continued it for two years and four months; that said road was made to bisect the buildings on each lot, and they were consequently partially torn away; and by reason of the operation of the railroad, said property could not be rented during that period of time. It further appears that it would require at least $1,000 to repair the buildings, and that the whole property was renting, when said railroad was commenced, for $450 per year.

"The committee concludes that petitioner is entitled to claim from the United States $2,375, and report a bill that he be paid that amount from the Treasury."

It appears that the claimant has not received pay on account of his said claim.

This committee are of opinion that the claimant ought to be paid the sum of $2,000 in discharge of his claim, and report the accompanying bill entitled "A bill for the relief of Washington Crossland," and recommend that the same be passed.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN CLINTON.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2345) for the relief of John Clinton, postmaster at Brownsville, Tennessee.

The bill was read. It directs the proper accounting officer of the Treasury to pay the sum of $265.35 to John Clinton, or his legal representative; the same to be in full of all claim for money stolen from the post-office at Brownsville, Tennessee, on the 1st day of November, 1870.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there a report in that case?

Mr. PRATT. On the 19th of December, 1872, by direction of the Committee on Claims, I submitted a report adverse to this claim of Mr. Clinton. The committee thought it was not a proper case for relief; that he had not taken care of the funds of his office in a sufficient manner. The case was not entirely clear from doubt. If the Senate will hear a brief statement of the case I will make it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Of course we cannot consider and debate this bill now if there is such an objection as that to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the bill?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly there is; I object for one.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside.

MRS. LOUISA P. MOLLOY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2089) for the relief of Mrs. Louisa P. Molloy; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill proposes to authorize the Postmaster-General to credit to the account of Mrs. Louisa P. Molloy, postmaster at Potosi, Washington County, Missouri, $170, on account of postage-stamps stolen from the office on the night of the 16th of December, 1872, and with the further sum of $125, being the amount of money stolen from a registered letter at the same time, the amount of which was paid by her to the owners thereof on the order of a special agent of the Post-Office Department; which credit may be allowed in her favor in any settlement hereafter made by her with the Post-Office Department.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOAB BAGLEY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 294) for the relief of Joab Bagley; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Chief Clerk read the bill and the amendment reported by the Committee on Private Land Claims as a substitute.

Mr. BOGY. Let that be laid over. There is a mistake in it.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I hope not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) Objection being made, the bill will be laid aside.

MARCUS OTTERBOURG.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask the Senate—it is on the Calendar and stands at the head of it—to dispose of a motion that I made some time ago to reconsider Senate bill No. 169 for the relief of Marcus Otterbourg, late consul of the United States at the city of Mexico, and minister to the republic of Mexico, which was reported favorably by the Committee on Foreign Relations. I entered a motion to reconsider, believing it to be wrong, and upon the papers that we then had I think it was; but I have made inquiry about it since, and I am satisfied thoroughly that Mr. Otterbourg did render valuable services to the United States for which he has not been paid. I think the bill ought to be amended by striking out the provision for paying him as consul, &c., so as to pay him simply as minister to Mexico from the 21st of June to the 30th of September, 1867, inclusive. For that time he has not been paid at all. He was appointed by Mr. Johnson lawfully in vacation, and the only difficulty about his right was that he took the oath before the wrong officer, there being nobody else before whom he could swear. On looking into the papers I am satisfied that it is just to Mr. Otterbourg that while he was minister he should be paid the regular pay. The pay as consul exercising diplomatic functions it does not appear to me he ought to have if he has been paid as consul proper, and it is not clear that he did in the proper sense exercise those functions and he has had some pay in that respect; but his pay as minister I am satisfied he ought to have and he never has had it. As an act of justice to him, who is a needy man, I ask the Senate to take up the motion to reconsider, and if my friend from Missouri [Mr. SCHURZ] will allow it to be reconsidered and I can move this amendment then we can pass the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the motion to reconsider this bill? The Chair hears none.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, by unanimous consent, without reconsidering the third reading, I move to amend the bill by striking out all of line 8 down to line 11, including the word "and." The words I move to strike out are "as consul and minister, the salary of consul to the city of Mexico, exercising diplomatic functions from April 8, 1866, until June 20, 1867, both inclusive; and;" so that it will read: "In full compensation for his services as minister to Mexico from June 21 until September 30," &c. I propose also to strike out all the words afterward at the end of the bill as to deductions which are to be made from his pay as consul. If we strike out the consulate provision no deduction ought to be made, as he has had no pay as minister.

Mr. SCHURZ. I cannot vote for that amendment, for the reason that Mr. Otterbourg really did act as consul exercising diplomatic functions, and if the Senator will look into the report of the Department of State for those years during which he did act as consul in Mexico he will find that that was the case. Still I do not want to go into a lengthy discussion of the bill, because that would defeat it entirely. I shall vote against this amendment, and will ask the Senate to vote against it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator ought not to do that, because one of the papers we have here from the State Department asserts that he never did exercise those functions. He thinks he did; I do not know but he did; but he has tried that question in the Court of Claims and has been beaten upon it; and he has had the proper allowances for everything except his salary as minister. I do not propose to deduct out of that salary anything at all, so that it really does not make a very large deduction of the amount in the bill and puts it upon grounds where I can see my way clear to vote for it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is this the order of business?

Mr. EDMUNDS. This has been taken up. I made the motion to reconsider. This is a poor man——

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator sets a very bad example in regard to his own rule. I think we had better proceed with the Calendar.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The case was taken up by unanimous consent.

Mr. SCHURZ. Let us dispose of this case.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have nothing further to say about it. The motion to reconsider is really a matter of privilege and ought to be allowed to come in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the bill so that it will read as follows:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to Marcus Otterbourg, late consul of the United States at the city of Mexico, and minister plenipotentiary to the republic of Mexico, in full compensation for his services as minister to Mexico from June 21 until September 30, 1867, both inclusive.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It merely provides to pay him as a minister. That he is clearly entitled to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the amendment? If not, it is agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

STATUE OF ADMIRAL FARRAGUT.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will inquire whether the hour agreed upon has not arrived?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired, and the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. ANTHONY. Before the morning hour expires I wish to make a motion to proceed to the consideration of the motion to reconsider the vote by which House joint resolution No. 59 amending joint resolution of April 16, 1872, relating to a statue of the late Admiral Farragut was passed. I do not care about its being acted upon to-day, but I want it to retain its place on the Calendar.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If it leads to no debate, let it be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island moves to take up the motion of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed the joint resolution in regard to a statue of the late Admiral Farragut.

Mr. ANTHONY. I wish to leave it on the Calendar.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will that displace the regular order?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, sir; it is taken up without doing that.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator who moved this is not in his seat.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not wish to have it acted upon now, but my desire is to prevent the right to reconsider being lost.

Mr. INGALLS. Was not the motion to reconsider laid on the table?

Mr. ANTHONY. It was.

Mr. INGALLS. How can it be reached except by a vote?

Mr. ANTHONY. It cannot be reached except by a vote. I make this motion that there may be a vote.

Mr. SHERMAN. Until the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. TIPTON] is in, I shall object. When he is in, I shall have no objection at all.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The Senator from Nebraska, knowing that I had an amendment which I desired to offer and an explanation to make, called up this bill in my absence, and I think the Senate ought to allow me a few minutes of explanation.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Nebraska can answer for himself; he is here.

Mr. TIPTON. I am here to say one word with the permission of the Senate. I had a conference with my friend from Vermont in regard to this little bill several days since, and it was mutually agreed between us that we would seek an opportunity to aid in its passage; he would take it up if he had an opportunity and I would take it up if I had an opportunity, and he would assist me in getting it up. When there was an opportunity to get it up in connection with the Meade monument, of course I thought it was my duty to move that it be taken up. I got it up. The Senator was not in his seat. I did not notice that at the time or certainly if he had been here I should not have interposed, if I had the power, any objection to anything he might desire to say. I never thought of taking any snap judgment on my friend, but thought I was carrying out the understanding between us that we would mutually try to get it up. I got it up and it went through very fast, and there is all the trouble about it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I desired it acted upon, but I desired to make an explanation on the subject.

Mr. STEWART. I hope the Senator from Vermont will have the opportunity he asks. It is in his charge, and it is but just that he should have an opportunity to make any explanation he desires.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I do not propose to do it now.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I suggest to the Senator from Nebraska, under the circumstances, to allow it to be reconsidered, and then it can be acted upon hereafter.

Mr. TIPTON. I cannot allow it. I did nothing in the matter that was not entirely honorable and entirely fair, and I will do nothing whatever that would insinuate that I had endeavored to get it through in any other than the manner in which it ought to be done.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Of course there can be no such inference as that.

Mr. TIPTON. It was a distinct understanding that we would mutually co-operate to try and get up that bill. I was fortunate in getting it up, and it was passed, and passed according to the forms of the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. But the Senator from Nebraska knew that I desired to submit some remarks in explanation of the amendments, the one that had been proposed, and another that I desired to offer. I do not desire to discuss the merits of the question on this motion, but there are certain things about it that I think the Senate ought to know.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Suppose the Senator then enters his motion and allows it to pass for the present.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That will not do. It must be taken up and put on the Calendar.

Mr. TIPTON. The motion to reconsider has already been voted down; and there is an end of the question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is a mistake.

Mr. TIPTON. It was laid on the table.

Mr. GORDON. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia calls for the regular order, which is the bill (H. R. No. 2190) granting pensions in certain cases.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I appeal to the Senator from Georgia to let us take a vote. There has been a misunderstanding between two Senators as to a bill which was passed in the absence of one of them.

Mr. GORDON. I have no objection if it will not occupy time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senator from Georgia will allow us to take a vote on this motion and put the matter on the Calendar; not dispose of the question now, but put it where it can be reserved for consideration. I think it ought to be done.

Mr. GORDON. I will yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state his understanding of this matter, and it may or may not dispense with the motion which the Senator from Vermont wishes to make. The Chair understands that by the rules of the Senate no such consequence follows the laying of a question on the table as does in the House of Representatives. That is only one way of laying a matter aside for the present, and a motion can be made at any time to proceed to consider that motion. The Chair does not understand that the Senator wishes to take up the motion to reconsider for consideration now, but merely to relieve it from the effect of the vote which has been made to lay it on the table. The Chair does not see what is to be gained by that vote, because at any hour when the Senate wishes to proceed to the consideration of it the Chair would rule that the motion to proceed to consider it would be in order.

Mr. STEWART. Does that hold the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does not hold the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Chair whether under these circumstances the bill would be returned to the House of Representatives? That is the point, because if it would it could get signed, and then considering the motion to reconsider after the bill was signed would not be particularly advantageous to anybody who wanted to reconsider.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I do not desire to defeat the bill, but simply desire to make an explanation which I think it my duty to make, and I believe it would be useful to the Senate that I should state the facts in relation to the matter. I pledge myself so far as my vote is concerned that the bill shall be acted upon before the session closes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the motion made by the Senator from Vermont to reconsider this vote be taken from the table.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will submit another motion. I move that the Senator from Vermont now by unanimous consent be allowed to make the explanation he desires to make.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the bill be put on the Calendar. A bill that has passed under a misapprehension ought to be suspended. Besides, there is this reason: I was requested by one of the gentlemen named in this bill to have it amended by striking out his name from it, as a matter of personal desire on his part, which I have promised to attend to. Knowing that the bill was far down on the Calendar and that we were going according to the regular order I stepped out to attend to a card that was sent in to me, for five minutes, and when I came back I found that although we had not reached the bill by a long way in regular order, it had passed. Under such circumstances, although I do the Senator from Nebraska the credit to say that he knew nothing of this request that had been made to me, I think it is right that this motion to reconsider should be placed on the Calendar, so that when we can reach it we can take up the bill and reconsider if the Senate will do so, in order that I may make the motion which I was requested to make.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to take from the table the motion to reconsider the joint resolution relative to the Farragut statue.

Mr. TIPTON. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. GORDON. If this question is to lead to debate I must insist on the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator insist on the regular order?

Mr. GORDON. I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the bill (H. R. No. 2190) to amend the act entitled "An act granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812, and the widows of deceased soldiers," approved February 14, 1871, and to restore to the pension-rolls those persons whose names were stricken therefrom in consequence of disloyalty, is before the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine.

Mr. GORDON. I believe I had not yielded the floor.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senator from Georgia rose and called for the regular order. The order was granted, and the Chair recognized the Senator from Maine. I think I have the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine is entitled to the floor. He was first recognized after the bill which is the unfinished business was taken up.

Mr. GORDON. Very well.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I desire to address myself to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. PRATT] who has charge of the pending bill, and to move the Senate that this bill and all prior orders be postponed for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill. I hope my friend from Indiana will see the propriety and necessity of my so doing, and will therefore acquiesce without a struggle for precedence. I make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves to postpone the pending order with a view to proceed to the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If my honorable friend from Indiana desires I will make a statement in regard to its obvious necessity at the present moment. Otherwise, if it is acquiesced in, I have nothing to say.

Mr. WINDOM. Will the Senator from Maine yield to me to make a report from the committee of conference on the Indian appropriation bill?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have no objection, but I do not like to lose the floor. Perhaps the Senator had better wait until this question is settled.

Mr. WINDOM. Very well; I will withhold the report for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves to postpone the pending order and to proceed to the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will say a single word, though I hardly think that to Senators who understand the character of the bill I need say anything. We have reached that period of the session when it would be perilous to the public interests and certainly to our understanding of what is the day of adjournment to postpone the consideration of this appropriation bill for an hour, even. It is one of the largest and most difficult of all the bills that are presented to the Senate of the United States during the session of Congress. It is the most difficult and complicated of the appropriation bills. It requires a great deal of deliberation and consideration, and Congress cannot afford to have it pushed into the hurry of the last hours of the session. When it has once passed from the Senate, as I hope it will in due time at no very late hour, then there will be opportunity, while it will be necessary to consider this bill in conference between the two Houses, for the transaction of such other business as the Senate may think important.

And now allow me to add, that considering the general understanding which has prevailed from the start in the Senate and considering the lateness of the hour when this bill came to us from the House, whenever the Committee on Appropriations are ready to proceed with an appropriation bill other bills and all other business of the Senate should be held in subordination to them. I hope, without spending any time on the order of business, I shall be permitted to go on. With this explanation I ask for the sense of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves to postpone the pending order and proceed with the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I hope that the regular order will not be postponed. It is very evident that if we go on with that bill we shall soon get through with it, and it is apparent from the opposition manifested last evening that if we suffer the pension bill now to be laid aside it will not be reached again during the present session. I hope therefore the friends of the bill which is the regular order will not suffer it to be displaced by any appropriation bill. There is no question but that we shall pass all the appropriation bills. The appropriation bills to take money out of the Treasury will all be passed. We shall not fail to pass all the appropriation bills at the proper time; but let us now pass the bill which is the regular order.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Now I desire to say a word in regard to that sort of argument. I have heard it so long that the Senator must excuse me if I manifest a little impatience under it. Here we are with only one day between us and the adjournment; and here is a bill involving $27,000,000, covering a great variety of the service of the United States, besides a great many claims that are in it; and we are told that it can be passed at any time, that there is a fate about an appropriation bill that it is sure to go through and you can trifle with it, and dally with it, and kick it this way and that; and gentlemen who are charged with this responsible duty are told when they have prepared one of these bills after labor so exhausting that they are ill prepared to go on with it that they can be turned aside while other things are being considered!

My honorable friend says that he appeals to the friends of the pension bill to stand by it. Well, Mr. President, there may be a proper time to stand by the bill; and I say to that honorable Senator that he is not authorized in any public sense whatever to rally a partisanship upon any particular bill or particular interest. Here is a bill embracing the whole interests of the country, extending very largely to interests which the Senator represents in his own State, as well as all of us; and no Senator should feel at liberty, unless he deems himself charged with a larger share of the public responsibilities than any one individual here should assume, to set aside the general understanding of the Senate upon a matter of so much importance as this to consider any one particular measure, when here is a bill involving the greatest variety of interests, all of them of a public character. I hope, therefore, we shall not spend any time on the order of business.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I certainly do not want to provoke the impatience of the Senator from Maine, but I want to say distinctly to him that I do not derive my authority on this floor as a Senator in the discharge of what I conceive to be a duty from the Senator from Maine or from the State of Maine. I choose to act upon my own judgment in reference to my own course in this Senate. I know full well that the opposition to the pending order is such that if we suffer it to be laid aside to take up the appropriation bill, or any other bill, we shall never reach it again during the present session. It was because I was seriously impressed with that conviction that I objected to the laying aside of the pending order in order to take up the appropriation bill reported by the Senator from Maine. I am in favor of passing the appropriation bills, and I have no question but that we shall do it; and if my insisting upon adherence to the regular order provokes the impatience of Senators, I am willing that that impatience should be manifested in any manner they see proper to manifest it; but I shall not take rebukes from the Senator from Maine, or any other Senator, I trust, while I have a duty to perform in the Senate and because I, simply in the discharge of that duty, see fit to say that I demand the regular order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I demand the yeas and nays on this question.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 36, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Anthony, Boreman, Boutwell, Buckingham, Carpenter, Chandler, Clayton, Edmunds, Fenton, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Hager, Hamlin, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Oglesby, Ramsey, Sargent, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Sprague, Stewart, Wadleigh, Washburn, West, Windom, and Wright—36.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Johnston, Kelly, McCreery, Merrimon, Norwood, Patterson, Pratt, Ransom, Robertson, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Thurman, and Tipton—22.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brownlow, Cameron, Conkling, Conover, Cragin, Dorsey, Ferry of Connecticut, Flanagan, Harvey, Jones, Lewis, Logan, Morton, Pease, and Stockton—15.

So the motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The appropriation bill is before the Senate.

Mr. GORDON. I now move that we take a recess at six until half-past seven o'clock, and at the reassembling of the Senate take up the pension bill just laid aside.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I hope my honorable friend will make that motion at a little later period when we can tell better about it. It may be that we may want to take a recess at an earlier hour if we should make dispatch with this bill.

Mr. GORDON. I withdraw the motion now and give notice that I shall make it when we reach the time.

Mr. SHERMAN. For fear when the motion is made it shall be understood that the pension bill is to come up this evening, I say now distinctly beforehand that I shall not consider any declaration from a gentleman making a motion to take the recess to bind me.

Mr. GORDON. I make no motion now.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The bill being up, I desire to make an observation or two. I wish to make a statement of a general character to attract the attention of the Senate to the importance of this bill, but I will yield to my friend from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] to make a conference report.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WINDOM. I submit a report from the committee of conference on the Indian Appropriation bill.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2343) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

THE DISTRICT GOVERNMENT.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. BABCOCK, his Secretary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid the message before the Senate, and it was read, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I respectfully invite the attention of Congress to one feature of the bill entitled "An act for the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes." Provision is therein made for the payment of the debts of the District in bonds, to be issued by the sinking-fund commissioners, running fifty years and bearing interest at the rate of 3.65 per cent. per annum, with the payment of the principal and interest guaranteed by the United States.

The government by which these debts were created is abolished and no other provision seems to be made for their payment. Judging from the transactions in other bonds there are good grounds, in my opinion, for the apprehension that bonds bearing this rate of interest when issued will be worth much less than their equivalent in the current money of the United States. This appears to me to be unjust to those to whom these bonds are to be paid, and to the extent of the difference between their face and real value looks like repudiating the debts of the District. My opinion is that to require creditors of the District of Columbia to receive these bonds at par when it is apparent that to be converted into money they must be sold at a large discount, will not only prove greatly injurious to the credit of the District but will reflect unfavorably upon the credit and good faith of the United States.

I would recommend therefore that provision be made at the present session of Congress to increase the interest upon these bonds, so that when sold they will bring an equivalent in money, and that the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to negotiate the sale of these bonds at not less than par and pay the proceeds thereof to those who may be ascertained to have valid claims against the District of Columbia.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, June 20, 1874.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The message will be laid on the table and printed, unless some motion be made.

Mr. THURMAN. I move that that message be referred to the Joint Committee to Investigate the Affairs of the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to; and the message was ordered to be printed.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 3600) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I desire to have the amendments reported by the Committee on Appropriations acted upon as they are reached in the reading of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) That course will be pursued if there be no objection.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations was in the appropriation for public printing, to strike out the following clause from lines 30 to 34:

And the amounts herein designated for the several Executive Departments may be distributed to the Bureaus thereof, at the discretion of the head of each Department, who shall certify such distribution to the Public Printer.

And in lieu thereof to insert the following:

Provided, That hereafter the Congressional Printer shall print, upon the order of the heads of the Executive Departments, respectively, only such limited number of the annual reports of such Departments and necessary accompanying reports of subordinates as may be deemed necessary for the use of Congress: Provided, however, That no expensive maps or illustrations shall be printed without the special order of Congress.

Mr. ANTHONY. I call the attention of the committee to what I think is a defect in this amendment. There are a number of reports, most of them statistical in their character, that are prepared by the various Departments and are printed for distribution by the Departments. The number is very small. I think there is no abuse in it. I think that if we are to have a Bureau of Statistics, for instance, to collect statistics, it is absurd to pack them away in the pigeon-holes or upon the shelves of the Departments. They should be printed for some purpose, for some diffusion of information. It strikes me that this amendment cuts off the power in the heads of Departments to print documents of this kind. Certainly, it seems to me, we ought to intrust the head of a Department with the power to print a few documents.

Mr. WEST. Is that all the amendment?

Mr. ANTHONY. It says "only for the use of Congress." I do not want the Departments to print documents for the use of Congress. We can print our own documents, and we do not want the Departments to order documents for the use of Congress and pay for them out of their appropriations for printing. That is our business. I move to amend the amendment in line 39, after the word "Congress," by inserting "and of the Departments ordering the same," thereby vesting in the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of State the power to print certain documents the information for which is collected in their Departments.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. My honorable friend will remember that this is the identical proposition with which he expressed entire satisfaction in his own bill; and I think if he will reflect upon it he will see that nothing less stringent than this will at all meet the difficulty which we all agree has been an abuse.

Mr. ANTHONY. My satisfaction was a good deal like the resignation of a colored brother when he was dying. He was resigned because he could not help it. This restriction was placed upon the bill which I reported; it did not come from the Committee on Printing. I assented to it as I did to almost everything else, in the hope that I could get something through, but I failed of that.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The committee understand that this has this scope and limitation: The Departments are authorized to print their own reports and such reports connected with them as become necessary for their illustration. The only limitation is that they shall not print expensive maps and illustrations.

Mr. ANTHONY. That I agree to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It is pretty much the same thing now properly. All the rest of it is an abuse. This is rather a stricture of the law as it ought to be and as we understand it is. Certainly we never intended that there should be that latitudinarian construction as to the printing of public documents which has prevailed in the Departments. It is aimed not at the heads of Departments, but at the Bureaus. The great difficulty has been that Bureaus, with a very laudable ambition doubtless in their very extensive pride of enterprise, to say the least of it, have indulged in the manufacture of books which have been very expensive, running the cost of our public printing up to over $3,000,000. It is aimed exactly at that practice. I do not think it goes one inch beyond that; nor do I believe the heads of Departments will suffer the slightest inconvenience by this. We had not the slightest disposition to restrict or curtail them. If it should be found to be so, it will be a very easy thing to correct it hereafter. I rather think that my friend will find it consistent with his duty, on the whole, to allow the amendment to go.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think the abuse has been corrected. It has been corrected in this bill, and very properly. The abuse has practically ceased, I think; but certainly this amendment restricts the heads of Departments from printing documents prepared in their own Departments.

Mr. SARGENT. Allow me to ask a question. What is the office the Senator performs so ably as chairman of the Committee on Printing? He is continually passing upon these departmental reports, the reports of the Light-house Board, the reports of the Hayden expedition, &c. All these are subordinate to the Departments. We require them to come to Congress to print the first copy. All this amendment reaches is that.

Mr. ANTHONY. And I gave notice yesterday, which I hoped might reach the heads of Departments, that under the disposition of the Senate to refuse the publication of such documents we should expect that the Executive Departments would make their estimates in their appropriations for printing, and confine themselves within them.

Mr. SARGENT. When they do that it is all right; but this does not trench on that. I suggest to my friend that this amendment does not change the law except that it cuts off certain fancy printing, which we think ought to come under the supervision of Congress so as to give the Senator more to do.

Mr. ANTHONY. In the Treasury Department there are prepared statements of statistics. Can they be printed with this restriction, "except in such limited numbers as may be necessary for the use of Congress?"

Mr. SARGENT. How are they printed now?

Mr. ANTHONY. They are printed now by authority of law, which I think this repeals.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. This does not repeal anything.

Mr. SARGENT. It simply refers to the immediate reports of the Departments and the Bureaus to the Departments.

Mr. ANTHONY. I know during the war there grew up very great abuses in printing. Four or five of the Departments, and I do not know but some of the Bureaus, had little printing offices, and I do not know but that some of them had places where they did engraving and lithographing. But all that has been cut off by an act of Congress, and very properly.

Mr. SARGENT. This simply refers to the regular reports of the Departments and the reports of the subordinate Bureaus in the Departments.

Mr. ANTHONY. Well, sir, I yield to authority and not to conviction.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move that during the consideration of this bill the rule limiting debate to five minutes on any one question shall apply.

The motion was agreed to.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was after line 44 to insert the following:

For the expenses of compiling and preparing the Congressional Directory, $1,200; which shall be expended under the direction of the Joint Committee on Public Printing, and the committee shall appoint some suitable person to superintend the same, and shall pay him out of this appropriation such compensation or additional compensation as they may deem proper.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line 69 to insert the following:

For establishing new life-saving stations on the sea and lake coasts of the United States, as authorized by law of the present Congress, $342,304.44.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line 112 to insert the following:

For the purchase of an engine and machinery, and for the erection and expenses incident to its operation, for the maceration of national-bank notes, United States notes, and other obligations of the United States authorized to be destroyed, $10,000; and that all such issues hereafter destroyed may be destroyed by maceration instead of burning to ashes, as now provided by law; and that so much of sections 24 and 43 of the national-currency act as requires national-bank notes to be burned to ashes is hereby repealed; that the pulp from such macerated issue shall be disposed of only under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 188 to reduce the appropriation "for continuing the collection of statistics of mines and mining to be laid before Congress, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury," from "$15,000" to "$10,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after the word "Hayden," in line 206, to insert "to continue the work westward toward the Green and Colorado Rivers, $75,000;" after "Powell," in line 208, to insert "in Utah, $15,000;" and in line 211 to strike out "$90,000;" so that the clause will read:

For the continuation of the geological and geographical surveys of the Territories of the United States by F. V. Hayden, to continue the work westward toward the Green and Colorado Rivers, $75,000; and J. W. Powell, in Utah, $15,000, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. Instead of striking out "$90,000," below, it would be better to say "in all $90,000." I suggest that that leaves it better, because the $90,000 is a footing

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection that modification will be made. The Chair hears none.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill.

Mr. SARGENT. On line 242 I ask leave to change the word "this" to "the," a verbal alteration; so as to read:

To enable the Clerk of the House to pay to the widow of David B. Mellish, late a member of the House, &c.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be made if there be no objection.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in lines 254, 255, and 256 to strike out:

And for amount already expended by the Sergeant-at-Arms for postage-stamps, $250.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line 303 the following:

For the erection of an equestrian statue of Nathanael Greene, in conformity with a resolution of Congress passed August 8, 1786, $40,000; and one member of each House of Congress, to be appointed by the presiding officer of each House, respectively, and George Washington Greene, of Rhode Island, be, and they are thereby, appointed a commission to contract for the same.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line 311 to insert:

To enable the Joint Committee on the Library to purchase such works of art for ornamenting the Capitol as may be ordered and approved, $10,000.

Mr. HOWE. I should like to have "15" inserted in the amendment instead of "10."

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think there is no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That change will be made if there be no objection.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was after line 314 to insert the following:

To enable the Librarian of Congress to employ two assistants, in connection with the work of the copyright department, and in preparing a complete index of subjects to the documents and debates of Congress, at $1,600 each, $3,200. And the Librarian is hereby charged with the work of preparing such an index, under the supervision of the Joint Committee on the Library; and he is hereby authorized and required to complete the two sets of congressional documents required by existing laws to be deposited in the Library of Congress, and which were partially destroyed by fire; and to this end he may make requisition upon the Secretary of the Interior, in charge of the reserve of public documents; and such volumes as cannot be supplied by the Interior Department may be transferred to the Library of Congress from the documents in charge of the Secretary of the Senate and of the Clerk of the House of Representatives, the Librarian of Congress giving a receipt therefor.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line 332 to insert:

For necessary repairs of the telegraph line connecting the Capitol and the Executive Departments, $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line 335 to insert:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line 343 to insert:

That of the unexpended balance of the appropriation made for the office of the Treasurer of the United States for the fiscal year ending with June 30, 1874, $20,000, or so much thereof as may be required, for the payment of salaries of clerks, messengers, and laborers to do the necessary work of that office, may be used for the purpose aforesaid, in the fiscal year ending with June 30, 1875: Provided, That no part of this amount shall be expended for payment of additional compensation to clerks or employés.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line 381 to insert:

For collecting information respecting the condition and importance of the fur trade in the Territory of Alaska, as provided by act of April 22, 1874, $10,000, for the fiscal years 1874 and 1875, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line 388 to insert the following:

For the District of Columbia, the sum of $1,300,000, to be expended by the commissioners of said District, and applied as follows: First, to the payment of interest on the funded debt of said District due July 1, 1874; secondly, to the payment of officers, employés, and laborers of the District, whether of the District proper or of the board of public works; and the remainder to the current expenses of said District; all the above sums, except so much thereof as may be paid for interest, as aforesaid, to be considered and adjusted hereafter as a part of the proper proportional sum to be paid by the United States toward the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia.

Mr. ALLISON. In line 396, after the words "public works," I move to insert "thirdly, to the payment of any indebtedness for which the securities of the District are pledged."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line 401 to insert the following:

For the payment of M. A. Clancy, for services as stenographer in taking testimony in the matter of the impeachment of Richard Busteed, district judge of the district of Alabama, the sum of $525.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move to amend that amendment by adding the following, which is an amendment of which I gave notice yesterday:

For the payment of C. H. Evans, for services under the direction of the Committee on Ways and Means of the Forty-second Congress, $500.

Mr. SARGENT. That should be reserved until we get through with the committee's amendments.

Mr. BOUTWELL. O, do not object. I shall not be able to remain here.

Mr. SARGENT. Very well; I make no objection.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to insert after line 406 the following:

For expenses of the Joint Select Committee to inquire into the Affairs of the District of Columbia the sum of $6,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. ALLISON. I move after the word "necessary" to insert "to be available immediately."

Mr. SARGENT. There is no objection to that.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to insert after line 409 the following:

For this amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to enable the Secretary of the Interior to pay for supplies furnished the Yankton Sioux Indians during the winter of 1866 and 1867, to prevent absolute starvation among said Indians, $11,329.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to offer the following amendment, to come in after line 416:

The sum of $32,220 is hereby appropriated to defray the expenses of the board of health of the District of Columbia for sanitary purposes for the fiscal year ending July 1, 1875; and the commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, directed to appropriate the same amount, namely, $32,220, from the funds of the District of Columbia not otherwise appropriated, for the same purpose.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to offer the following amendment, to come in at this point:

That the sum of $1,000 is hereby appropriated for the salary of the Government telegraph operators at the Capitol during the recess of Congress, $500 of the same to be paid by the Secretary of the Senate, and $500 to be paid by the Clerk of the House of Representatives for the salary of the operator of the House.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Chief Clerk continued the reading of the bill.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to insert after line 471:

For the purchase for an Indian agency station, the six hundred and forty acres of land situated on Lapwai Creek and Clearwater River, Idaho Territory, heretofore granted to the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, $15,000: Provided, That no part of this sum shall be paid until a perfect title to the said land shall be made to the United States by a warranty deed, to be approved by the Attorney-General.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I should like to hear some explanation about that.

Mr. SARGENT. The condition of things is just this: Years ago under a general law the American board of commissioners were granted this piece of land by the United States Government. They had possession of it for years and sold it. Since that time, and when this fact was not much considered or was overlooked, the United States built agency buildings worth from one to two hundred thousand dollars upon this very piece of land, and now have the buildings while the title to the land is recognized by the courts to be in the person who bought from the American board of commissioners for missions. The Government, then, is in the condition of losing from one to two hundred thousand dollars' worth of property, which it is now using and needs, or of buying the title so as to get a good title, and we thought it economical to do the latter.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Does the Senator know that $50,000 will be enough to obtain the title?

Mr. SARGENT. The Interior Department think it will, and we think it will.

Mr. ROBERTSON. But I would not like to spend this money and then not get a title.

Mr. SARGENT. The condition of the appropriation is that a good title shall be given to the United States. If the money will not secure the title it will not be spent.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Chief Clerk continued the reading of the bill.

Mr. SARGENT. On page 21, line 507, the word "forty" should be "eighty." I move the amendment by order of the committee. That increases the appropriation for surveying the public lands in Nebraska from $40,000 to $80,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line 529 to increase the appropriation for surveying the public lands in Idaho Territory from $20,000 to $30,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 533 to increase the appropriation for surveying the public lands in New Mexico Territory from $20,000 to $30,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 755 to increase the appropriation for surveying the public lands in Oregon from $40,000 to $60,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 563 to increase the appropriation for surveying the public lands in Washington Territory from $40,000 to $60,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line 615 to insert the following clause:

For lathing and plastering the under surface of the roof above the ceiling of the Senate Chamber, $4,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line 618 to insert:

For a new steam pump to supply the tanks located in the attic of the Senate wing of the Capitol, $800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line 621 to insert:

For replacing the defective portion of the roof on the Capitol, near the dome, by a copper roofing of fire-proof construction, and for erecting fire-walls, $15,000: Provided, That the old materials shall be remanufactured and used in the repairs of the Capitol.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line 626 to insert the following:

For a commission consisting of Fred. Law Olmsted, of New York; William Hammond Hall, of San Francisco; and H. W. S. Cleveland, of Chicago, to consider and report to Congress, at its next session, by what economical measures the greatest public value may be given to the connected series of Government grounds, including those of the Capitol and those of the Executive Mansion, the sum of $1,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line 634 to insert:

For improvement of Capitol grounds, according to the plans and under the general direction of Fred. Law Olmsted, to be expended by the architect of the Capitol, $200,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. It seems to me there ought to be some limit inserted here providing that the whole expenditure contemplated by the plan proposed shall not exceed the sum of $200,000, so far as the grounds are concerned. We know very well that a distinguished person like Mr. Olmsted may lay out a plan that may cost many times this. He may provide for fountains and all sorts of ornaments. It seems to me there ought to be some limit. I will ask the Senator from Vermont if $200,000 is intended to cover the whole improvement of the Capitol grounds, or is it a mere entering-wedge?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I do not desire to take up much time in explanation of this amendment. The House have proposed $125,000, as will be seen by the next clause, and the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Senate thought that would be insufficient, and perhaps we ought to have proposed $250,000 instead of $200,000. The Senator from Ohio need not be under any apprehension that there will be anything done with this $200,000 so as to involve the Government in any very large expenditure, but it is obvious that there must be a considerable amount expended before the work can be completed; and if the Senate will be patient to listen to me five or ten minutes I will explain something of the plan of Mr. Olmsted.

It is that on the east side of the Capitol grounds the trees shall be thinned out so as to have open spaces or vistas, and leaving the two clumps of trees that now stand on either side of the Capitol mainly as they now stand. The surface of the ground here will scarcely need to be much reduced, and if reduced at all these trees can still be left mainly as they are. Then there will be considerable of an open space of oval shape on either side; and on the farther or eastern portion of the grounds the trees will have to be removed, because the grade of the ground will have to be reduced about six feet. Some of the trees can be saved and replanted. Then here in the front the idea of Mr. Olmsted is that the present platform or terrace is too narrow to support the magnificent structure above it; that it has too much the appearance of a cheap fortification, and the base is too thin for the large building to stand upon. Mr. Olmsted, the landscape architect, proposes therefore to extend the terrace about twenty feet, and to support it by a granite wall surmounted by some slight decoration; and that in the end there shall be far more acceptable stairways on the east side than those we now have, something in better proportion to the magnificence of the building and equal to those that are on the west side. The central walk he proposes to obliterate, and the trees that are on that walk it will have been noticed are such kind of trees as ought to be removed. They are no longer ornamental. They are mainly poplars or cottonwood trees, that are a positive nuisance as they stand and shut out the whole view from the western front. The other two walks diverging right and left will be left to remain as they now are.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have great confidence in the good taste and love of economy of my friend from Vermont; but I want to know whether this $200,000 covers the gross expenditure.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I do not expect it will. I am free to say that I think it will take considerably more. These stairways will cost I do not know how much, but not a dollar more will be expended than is absolutely necessary.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senate ought to know from the proper committee, before authorizing this work to be commenced under Mr. Olmsted's plans, what is to be the cost of carrying out those plans. Those plans, I take it, are already prepared and announced.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I may say that it has been impossible in the short time since Mr. Olmsted has been authorized to make these plans, to have them completed in full.

Mr. HOWE. Allow me to make a suggestion to the Senator from Ohio. That Senator has entire confidence in the economical views of the Senator from Vermont as the Senate has.

Mr. SHERMAN. But I should like to cross-examine him a little on public buildings. That is rather a soft place with my friend from Vermont.

Mr. HOWE. I was about to inquire if the Senate would not be entirely content with this provision:

Provided, The chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds is associated with Mr. Olmsted in the general direction of these improvements.

Mr. SHERMAN. That would be a very good suggestion.

Mr. HOWE. Then I move that amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it ought to be under the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the two Houses, as a matter of course.

Mr. HOWE. A large body is not very desirable for such a purpose.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it ought to be under some committee of Congress, so as not entirely to carry out the magnificent ideas of an architect, or a landscape gardener, who may be still more dangerous.

Mr. HOWE. I move to amend by adding after "Olmsted," in line 637, the words "and the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Senate."

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Let me say to my friend from Wisconsin that I have no desire myself to occupy this position. I think it would not be acceptable to the House to have the chairman of one of our committees placed in this position, or to have a committee of the Senate alone, and therefore I think it had better be omitted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin to the amendment of the committee, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert after "Olmsted," in line 637, the words "and the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Senate."

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I hope the Senate will not agree to that, for the reason that it might detain the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds here during the coming summer. If it was merely for us to come here once or twice we might be able to do that; but I think the Senator from Wisconsin had better select somebody else than put my name in there or that of our committee. I am quite satisfied that the House will not consent to have a committee of the Senate named alone.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Let us go on and we can settle this in the Senate.

Mr. HOWE. Let it go now and we will consider it in the Senate. ["Agreed."]

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out from line 639 to 642 the following clause:

For improving the Capitol grounds, for coping and flagging the foot-walks around the same, and for paving the roadway at the eastern front, $125,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 647 to insert the words "and stable" after "engine-house," and in line 649 to strike out "10" and insert "15;" so as to make the clause read:

For the purpose of erecting on Capitol Hill, near the Capitol building, a suitable engine-house and stable to supply the place of engine-house No. 3, recently ordered removed by Congress, $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the following clause, beginning in line 650:

For preservation and repairs of the United States court-house in Washington City, formerly known as the City-hall building, $3,000.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

For extending court-house (old City-hall) in the city of Washington, in accordance with plans of the architect of the Capitol, to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior, for the accommodation of the District courts, Court of Claims, and the Pension Office, and for making the necessary repairs to the old building, $150,000.

Mr. HOWE. I wish that might be amended so as to provide either for extending the present building or constructing a new building, as the architect shall think best. My reason is that the plan of the present building is one which it seems to me ought not to be extended. There must be a great deal of additional room provided sooner or later; and it seems to me that instead of trying to extend the present building, it might be thought better to devise a new building. The present building is not worth much; the material to put into a new building it seems to me is worth as much as the present building. If the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds will be content with the amendment I have suggested I should prefer it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. We have already paid $75,000 for one-half of this building. I think that the plan suggested by the architect of the Capitol extension is a very valuable plan; that it will give us about three times the amount of room we now have, and when the building is up it will be a very handsome looking building. It is proposed to extend it so as to reach to E street and have a frontage on three sides. That will certainly not make a bad appearance, (exhibiting the plan.) There is a pressing necessity for more room in this Capitol for committees in both branches. We are compelled to put two committees into one room to a very considerable extent. The Court of Claims occupy valuable space that might be converted into several committee-rooms. There is also a necessity for some room for the Commissioner of Pensions, all of whose papers are now in what is called the Seaton House, very liable to fire; and the loss would be immense if the papers were destroyed. This building can be extended so as to give the courts of the District, the Court of Claims, and the Pension Bureau ample room at a very small expense.

Mr. SARGENT. For the appropriation here?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. We only propose to expend a portion this season.

Mr. HOWE. I do not object to the appropriation at all; I only ask the Senator to consent to an amendment which will leave to the architect the alternative either of extending this building or building on a new plan, as shall be thought best after due consultation.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I have no objection to that.

Mr. SARGENT. I object; I suggest that we shall find a building that will cost $6,000,000 before we get through if we do that. How much does it take to build a public building from the ground up in this city? One hundred and fifty thousand dollars will put this building into shape.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. No. When the building is entirely completed it will cost $239,000.

Mr. SARGENT. All right. Now, to start from the ground up and taking down this building will cost us $6,000,000.

Mr. HOWE. It would cost necessarily no more if you accept the amendment that I propose. It leaves an alternative to the architect. No one here knows whether he can enlarge this building cheaper than he can build a new one or not.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Of course he can enlarge this cheaper than construct a new building. There cannot be any doubt about that. I think the clause had better go as it is, because the plans are already made out.

Mr. HOWE. I withdraw my amendment until we get into the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to offer the following amendment to come in at this point:

To secure the foundation walls and fit up rooms in the basement of the General Post-Office building, $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Chief Clerk continued the reading of the bill.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to insert after line 685 the following clause:

To pay the indebtedness incurred and now due, and to pay in part the expenses of the Reform School of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, it being for food and clothing of the boys in said school, the sum of $15,000; to be deducted from any money hereafter appropriated for the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line 733 to insert:

For continuing the work on the erection and fitting up the buildings of the institution in accordance with plans heretofore submitted to Congress, $29,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line 761 to insert:

For the Women's Christian Association of the District of Columbia, $25,000; to be expended for the sole purpose of erecting a building on the ground owned by said association in said District, upon and in strict conformity with a plan for said building, which shall be prepared by the architect of the Capitol extension; and it shall not, for building and furnishing, exceed the said sum of $25,000; and no money shall be paid under this appropriation until the Secretary of the Treasury shall be satisfied that a contract, with good security for its execution, has been entered into for the erection and furnishing of said building, at a sum not exceeding the amount hereby appropriated; and all payments for the erection and furnishing of said building shall be made by the Secretary of the Treasury directly upon vouchers to be approved by him: Provided, (and this appropriation is upon the express condition,) That none of the money hereby appropriated shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury until said association shall file, with the recorder of deeds in the District of Columbia, a declaration, executed and acknowledged in the manner in which deeds are required by law to be executed for record in the District of Columbia, that said building, and the lands on which it is erected, forever shall be held in trust by said association, without mortgage or security in the nature of mortgage, for the sole purposes of said association, as defined in its charter of date of December 13, 1870; and the filing of said declaration shall be regarded as notice to all persons who shall purchase said property or take any security thereon.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line 792 to insert:

For the Little Sisters of the Poor of Washington City, to liquidate a debt on the building and to complete said building, $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line 843 to insert the following:

For building a steamer for the Coast Survey, for use on the Gulf coast, $76,000.

Mr. HOWE. I want to ask the Senator in charge of the bill if there are not plenty of unused vessels in the Navy that could be had?

Mr. SARGENT. No; not for this purpose. It requires a strong, light-draught steamer to survey the shoals there—a steamer strong enough to stand any storm if it happens to be caught in one, and light enough to take refuge in the shallow and narrow inlets.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 888, 889, and 890, in the following words:

To pay commissions allowed by law to collectors of customs acting as superintendents of lights, $8,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line 898 to insert:

For re-establishing the light-house at Indian Island, at Rockport Harbor, Maine, $9,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

Mr. SARGENT. On page 39 I ask leave to change the name "Navesink" to "Neversink," in the two places where it occurs. According to Lippincott's Gazetteer "Neversink" is the proper spelling.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection that correction will be made.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was on page 39 to strike out from lines 940 to 951, inclusive, in the following words:

Provided, That whenever it may become necessary, in the adjustment of boundary lines or in the opening or changing of necessary roadways affecting lands belonging to the United States and used for the purposes of the light-house establishments at Staten Island, New York, and at the Highlands of Neversink, New Jersey, or any part thereof, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to execute for such purposes touching the property above referred to, or any part thereof, the necessary conveyances and assurances, and to receive, in consideration therefor, such other conveyances or assurances of adjoining lands, or of lands in the immediate vicinity, or other consideration, as may be agreed upon.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 955 to 960, inclusive, in the following words:

And the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to place a fog-bell (to be rung during the prevalence of a fog) at such points at or near the entrance to the harbor of New York as may be designated by the proper officers; the expenses thereof to be paid out of any unappropriated money in the Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

Mr. SARGENT. In line 971 I move to strike out "approved" and insert the word "made," so as to read "the balance of appropriation made June 10, 1872."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That correction will be made if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

The next amendment was of the Committee on Appropriations after line 1010 to insert:

For building a light-house at or near Solomon's Lump, in Kedges Strait, between Tangier Sound and Chesapeake Bay, $15,000: Provided, That the light-house at Fog Point be discontinued after the completion of the above.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 1048 to strike out the word "Virginia" and insert "or Port Tobacco flats, in the discretion of the Department;" so as to read:

For light-house and day-beacon at or in the vicinity of Mathias Point, or Port Tobacco flats, in the discretion of the Department, $40,000.

Mr. SARGENT. That should be "in the discretion of the Light-house Board."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be so modified if there be no objection.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. The Committee on Appropriations have instructed me to move to strike out from line 1075 to the end of the paragraph the clause extending the jurisdiction of the Light-house Board over the Mississippi, Missouri, and Ohio Rivers.

The Chief Clerk read the words proposed to be stricken out, as follows:

That the jurisdiction of the Light-house Board, created by the act entitled "An act making appropriations for light-houses, light-boats, buoys, &c., and providing for the erection and establishment of the same, and for other purposes," approved August 31, 1852, is hereby extended over the Mississippi, Ohio, and Missouri Rivers, for the establishment of such beacon-lights, day-beacons, and buoys as may be necessary for the use of vessels navigating those streams; and for this purpose the said board is hereby required to divide the designated rivers into one or two additional light-house districts, to be in all respects similar to the already existing light-house districts; and is hereby authorized to lease the necessary ground for all such lights and beacons as are used to point out changeable channels, and which in consequence cannot be made permanent.

Mr. BOGY. I hope that amendment will not be adopted, and I will state the reason why. It will be seen by reading the paragraph that it is an appropriation of $50,000 for the erection of light-houses on the Mississippi, Ohio, and Missouri Rivers, and to make that available it is proper that the work be put under the control of the Light-house Board. If we are to build light-houses on the Mississippi River where they are necessary and where they have been petitioned for by a large number of people in the West, they should be under the control of the Light-house Board. I will state furthermore that two bills have passed the House this winter on this very subject. It is a matter which is very much desired in the West, and I believe it to be very important. The appropriation is small, and it will be seen it is for a survey of these rivers, and if it is deemed proper that these light-houses should be established in the West, they should be placed under the control of the Light-house Board. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. HAMLIN. I should like to know of the committee who reported the bill why this language is not wise, well, and proper. If buoys are to be placed in the rivers, if light-houses are to be erected upon their banks, if any of those works which come appropriately within the jurisdiction of the Light-house Board are to be erected, why should they not, and why is it not better that they should have jurisdiction there as they have it elsewhere? The Light-house Board has systematized its methods of business. They have their rules which apply, I believe, as near as may be equally to all sections, and they understand precisely what is appropriate in one case as well as in another. I cannot see any objection to this clause, and it seems to me that it is much wiser and much better that the whole thing should be under one jurisdiction, and then it will be better cared for. I should like to know what reason there is for striking out the clause.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STEVENSON] has the matter in charge, and I desire him to explain it.

Mr. HAMLIN. I should like to hear what he has to say.

Mr. STEVENSON. I live on the Ohio River, and I have lived on the Mississippi. If there is any necessity for a light-house, I am not aware of it. I am for economizing as far as I can, and yet willing to appropriate any money that is deemed necessary. I have never been convinced that light-houses were necessary either on the Mississippi or the Ohio River. On the contrary my experience is exactly the reverse. I remember, many years ago, that a light-house was erected at Natchez. It was put there at considerable cost, and during my residence in Mississippi and my frequent visits to New Orleans it was always spoken of as "the folly" both of the man who planned it and of the Government who put it there, as being wholly and entirely unnecessary. That is my experience. I have never seen one that was necessary. I have never heard any demand for one. As for the surveys, they may be very necessary, and I should have no objection to the establishment of buoys; but as to light-houses, I think they will be entirely unnecessary on these rivers, so far as I know or believe.

Mr. HAMLIN. Let me ask my friend if this clause makes any provision for light-houses? None whatever. It refers to a bill which does, and in that bill light-boats, buoys, &c., are designated. I ask the Senator, who knows very much better than I do, if there are no buoys, if there are no monuments in any of the rivers of the West to mark the shoals and all the dangerous places? Upon the little rivers which we have and over which the Light-house Board has entire control we have buoys, we have signals, and we have a variety of methods of designating sunken rocks, shoals, and quicksand, and they are all under the Light-house Board. I had supposed that some such thing might be necessary upon these rivers. I do not think this clause suggests the idea of building light-houses.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, I am not a theorist. I have, however, some practical knowledge on this subject. I have lived for thirty-odd years uninterruptedly on the Ohio. Any gentleman who is acquainted with that river knows that it is continually shifting its bars, and if you were to put a buoy there this year you would probably have to change it next year. I am unwilling to put these rivers under the Light-house Board. I am unwilling that they should have jurisdiction over subjects which it does not seem to me come within the purview of their organization as a board.

Now, in regard to light-houses, I am always willing, wherever they are necessary, to erect them; but I have already stated I do not think they are necessary here. In regard to buoys and things of that sort, let them be established by the river commissioners, those under whose charge the Mississippi River is, and not give to this Light-house Board the jurisdiction of these rivers, which they do not understand and are not half as familiar with as the western people, whose business it is to navigate them. The Government has already officers connected with these rivers. I am very unwilling to extend the jurisdiction of the Light-house Board to these rivers; but I have no feeling about it at all.

Mr. BOGY. I will state that this provision is perhaps the work of the delegation from Missouri; in fact I know that it is so; and it was brought about by the solicitation of the boatmen on the Mississippi. I do not know anything about the Ohio. I know this is very much desired by the boatmen on the Mississippi; I know it is very much desired by the exchange of the city of Saint Louis, and I hold in my hand a pamphlet containing all the information on this subject in regard to the importance of light-houses and buoys, and requesting the whole to be placed under the control of this Light-house Board; and I can say from having conversed with some of the leading boatmen of the West in the city of Washington this winter, that they are very anxious for this thing. I believe myself it is an absolute necessity. If there are to be light-houses in the West they certainly ought to be under some control, and I can myself imagine no objection to placing them under the control of the Light-house Board. I think it is the proper place, because it is a board especially for this purpose. I do hope that this paragraph will be permitted to remain as it is and not be altered at all. I know this appropriation is desired in the West and on the Mississippi River.

Mr. STEVENSON. Of course I do not desire to antagonize with the Senator from Missouri; but I am astonished that he should declare his belief that light-houses are necessary on those rivers, when we have been here for eighty or ninety years without one proposition ever having been made, so far as I know or believe, for one. He knows as well as I do that the only one that was erected on the Mississippi River was regarded as a consummate folly. I see around me gentlemen older than myself who are acquainted with that country, and who no doubt have seen that light-house, as I have. It was permitted to tumble into the river. It was not used for years before it did tumble in. The Senator has seen, I have no doubt, oftener than I have, the light-house at Natchez known as "The Folly." That was the name given to it by the people. If we are to go into this business of putting light-houses on the river, and I want the Ohio and Mississippi to have everything that is necessary for their improvement, I should like the Light-house Board itself to make some recommendations.

Mr. BOGY. This is for a survey of the Mississippi, and then when by the survey the light-houses are found to be necessary they are to be placed under the control of the Light-house Board.

Mr. SARGENT. They are required to be divided by districts now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the committee.

Mr. BOGY. Let us understand the question. This is the provision of the bill as it comes from the House without amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the committee move to strike out.

Mr. SARGENT. Exactly. I made the motion myself on behalf of the committee

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is to strike out. The Secretary will report the amendment as proposed by the committee.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment.

The question being put, a division was called for; and there were—ayes 19, noes 14; no quorum voting.

Mr. ANTHONY. There is a quorum present.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us have another division. I hope the amendment will be agreed to, as it is recommended by the committee.

Mr. SARGENT. Yes, sir; the committee have recommended it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the committee has recommended the amendment.

Mr. BOGY. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SARGENT. It can be reserved in the Senate.

Mr. BOGY. We may as well vote upon it now as then.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator insist on the call?

Mr. BOGY. I will not insist on it.

The question being again put, the amendment was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 22, noes 16.

Mr. BOGY. I give notice that I shall reserve this amendment in the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSTON. The word "Virginia" has been omitted in line 1115 after the words "York River." It is an accidental omission I suppose.

Mr. SARGENT. There is no necessity for the insertion of the word "Virginia" after the word "River."

Mr. JOHNSTON. I prefer to have it put in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be made if there be no objection. The Chair hears no objection.

The Chief Clerk continued the reading of the bill.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out the following proviso to the appropriation for the construction of a light-house at the mouth of Thunder Bay River, in the State of Michigan, in line 1118:

Provided, That all tolls on vessels entering or leaving the river shall be abolished after the light-house is completed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 1133, before the words "fog-signal" insert "light-house and;" so as to read:

For a light-house and fog-signal on Yerba Buena Island, in the Bay of San Francisco, California, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert at the end of the clause making available the unexpended balance of the appropriation for a first-class light-house and fog-signal at Piedras Blancas, California, the following words:

And the balance of the appropriation made by the act of June 10, 1872, for the construction of a light-house and fog-signal at Point Fermin light-station, remaining unexpended, is hereby reappropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line 1143 the following clause:

To enable the Light-house Board to continue its experiments in relation to fog-bells or other signals for the protection of the commercial marine, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move to amend by inserting after line 1146 the following:

For building a relief light-ship for general service, in addition to the amount heretofore appropriated, $15,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

There was a small sum appropriated, twenty-five or thirty thousand dollars, last year, and it is found on opening the bids that this sum in addition is necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Chief Clerk continued the reading of the bill.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out the following clause from line 1197 to line 1200:

To enable the Secretary of War to provide for constructing a military bridge across the North Platte River, at or near Fort Laramie, Wyoming Territory, $15,000.

Mr. SARGENT. The committee withdraw that amendment so that that clause shall stand as part of the text.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the amendment will be regarded as disagreed to, so that the clause remains in the bill.

The Chief Clerk continued the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was after line 1232 to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the Secretary of War is authorized to employ not exceeding thirteen enlisted men for one year in the Ordnance Bureau.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line 1243 to insert the following:

For continuing experiments with the Moffatt system of breech-loading cannon, under the direction of the Secretary of War, the sum of $10,000 is hereby appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line 1247 to insert:

For the purpose of testing Mr. Lee's breech-loading gun, under the direction of the Secretary of War, the sum of $10,000 is hereby appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill, and read the clause making appropriations for the Signal Office.

Mr. OGLESBY. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Printing what is meant by "maps" and "bulletins" and how they are printed. I ask the question because I hear it said that while the Bureaus are complaining of a want of accommodations they are putting up printing-presses and crowding in printers, engravers, &c.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think not. There was, as I stated in speaking upon an amendment in the early part of this bill, a time when in nearly all the Departments there were little printing offices. I do not think there was any engraving; but there may have been. They were all abolished after the war by an act of Congress, as they should have been. There is in the Signal Office a little lithographic press for printing the daily reports, the little weather maps that are sent around. That work must necessarily be done in the Signal Office because the maps are altered three times a day, and it would be almost impossible to have that work done properly out of the office. But the general maps and bulletins that they publish are done at private establishments where they ought to be done, and where of course they can be done better than they can at the Government establishment. Undoubtedly work of that kind costs more at a Government establishment than anywhere else. Some of that work must be done there; but that I think does not come under this clause.

Mr. SARGENT. I offer an amendment to come in after line 1298:

For this amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the erection of winter quarters for troops stationed near the Red Cloud and Whetstone Indian agencies, $30,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Chief Clerk continued the reading of the bill.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to insert at the end of the clause making appropriations for the support of Freedmen's Hospital and Asylum at Washington, District of Columbia, the following proviso:

Provided, That after June 30, 1874, the Freedmen's Hospital in the District of Columbia shall, until otherwise ordered by Congress, be continued under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, who shall make all estimates and pass all accounts, and shall be accountable to the Treasury of the United States for all expenditures; and all property, including hospital and quartermaster's stores, belonging to said hospital, and now in charge of the War Department, be also transferred to the Interior Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line 1314 the following clause:

For the National Association for the Relief of the Colored Women and Children of the District of Columbia, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 1332 to strike out after the words "distributed as" the word "heretofore," in line 1333 before the word "sixty" to insert the words "Congress may hereafter direct," and in line 1335 after the words "edition of" to strike out the word "five" and insert "ten;" so as to read:

For continuing the publication of the Medical and Surgical History of the War, to be distributed as Congress may hereafter direct, $60,000; to be used in the preparation of illustrations for a new edition of ten thousand copies of entire work; Provided, That the necessary engraving and lithographing for those publications may be executed under the directions of the Secretary of War, without advertisement.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OGLESBY. What is meant by "ten thousand copies of entire work?" Do the committee mean to republish the two volumes already published? Two volumes of this work have been published. Do I understand the committee to provide for ten thousand additional copies of those volumes?

Mr. SARGENT. Yes; we intend to print those. There is an enormous demand for this book from the Senator's own State, certainly from mine, and every other State.

Mr. OGLESBY. And the object is to reprint those volumes?

Mr. SARGENT. The object is to make a complete edition from the beginning to the end. It is too valuable a book to be printed in the limited amount which we have provided for. It costs too much in proportion to the number we have to give out.

Mr. OGLESBY. I ask the Senator from California if he can state what has been about the cost of each volume.

Mr. SARGENT. The cost of course has been large, because there are so few printed. The cost is in the illustrations and in getting up the book, and of course if a thousand copies of an expensive book are printed, each copy costs a great deal more in proportion than if twenty thousand copies were printed. I cannot tell the cost of each book, but I have no doubt about eighteen dollars.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to insert after line 1338 the following clause:

For completing the medical statistics of the Provost-Marshal-General's Bureau, the unexpended balance of the appropriation made by the act of July 28, 1866, is hereby continued and made available. And the chief medical purveyor of the Army shall have the rank and pay of colonel.

Mr. SARGENT. After the word "pay" the words "and emoluments" should be inserted, and strike out the word "and" before it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be so modified.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 1362 to 1365, inclusive, in the following words:

For a resurvey of the Ausable River, Michigan, and establishing dock lines, not exceeding $1,000, to be paid for from unexpended balance of appropriation heretofore made for the improvement or said river.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line 1381 to insert the following clause:

For improving the portion of Franklin Square on K street lately added to those grounds, and for grading and completing edges of walks, and for granite coping for fountain bowl, and planting trees, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in lines 1387 and 1388 after the words "Lincoln Square" to strike out the words "or such reservation as the President may select;" so as to read:

For a pedestal for Ball's bronze statue of Lincoln, to be placed in Lincoln Square, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. In line 1454 "1,500" should be stricken out and "3,000" inserted; so as to make the appropriation, under the head of Washington aqueduct, for building dwelling and office at Great Falls, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line 1461 to insert the following:

For widening embankments along the line of the Washington aqueduct, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 1465, 1466, and 1467, in the following words:

For bounty to seamen, to pay certificates issued to State of New Hampshire, $739.50.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after line 1497, to insert as an additional proviso in the clause appropriating for repairs at the different navy-yards and preservation of the same the following clause:

Provided further, That the Secretary of the Navy be authorized to use, during the ensuing fiscal year, the balance of appropriation heretofore made to the Navy Department for the construction of a floating iron dock, remaining unexpended, for the purpose of completing the repairs on the double-turreted monitors Miantonomah, Puritan, Terror, and Monadnock: Provided further, That the period of retirement for naval constructors shall be at sixty-five instead of sixty-two years, as now provided.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line 1540, in the appropriation for custom-house and post-office building at Cincinnati, Ohio, to insert:

And the entire cost of said building, exclusive of cost of site, shall not exceed $4,000,000.

Mr. SARGENT. By some mistake there is a transfer of amounts between Cincinnati and Philadelphia. In order that it may be corrected I move here to strike out "$4,000,000" and insert "$3,500,000," and I shall move a corresponding amendment when we reach the appropriation for the building at Philadelphia.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 1548 to add the following proviso to the appropriation for custom-house, court-house, and post-office building at Evansville, Indiana:

Provided, That the restrictions as to the material of which said building shall be constructed are hereby removed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. I offer the following amendment to come in after line 1550:

And provided further, That the restrictions as to the material of which the post-office building at Lincoln, Nebraska, shall be constructed are hereby removed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to add after the word "dollars," in line 1553, the words "and the entire cost of such building, exclusive of cost of site, shall not exceed $400,000;" so as to read:

Custom-house and post-office, Hartford, Connecticut: For continuation of building, $150,000. And the entire cost of said building, exclusive of cost of site, shall not exceed $400,000.

Mr. SARGENT. The city of Hartford gave the site; and the expression "exclusive of cost of site" is inadvertent, and for that reason I move to strike it out.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line 1567 to strike out "$50,000" and insert "$98,868;" and in line 1569 to strike out "$200,000" and insert "$375,000;" in line 1571 to strike out "$200,000" and insert "$375,000;" in line 1573 to strike out "$344,207.82" and insert "$656,705.72;" so as to make the clause read:

Post-office and court-house at New York, New York: For completing building, $794,207.82; for paving, grading, fencing, and sewerage, $198,868; for heating and ventilation, hoisting apparatus, and machinery, $236,000; for furniture, including fittings, fixtures, counters, and carpets, $375,000; making in all the sum of $1,656,705.72.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in the proviso to the same clause, in line 1579, to strike out the words "of the amount herein" and insert "which amount is hereby."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 1585, in the appropriation for the custom-house at Portland, Oregon, to increase the appropriation "for grading, fences, and approaches" from $20,000 to $29,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add to the clause for the court-house and post-office at Philadelphia, for the continuation of the construction of the building, the words:

And the entire cost of said building, exclusive of cost of site, shall not exceed $3,500,000.

Mr. SARGENT. This concludes the amendment which I made a few moments ago, reversing Philadelphia to correct a mistake; "$3,500,000" should be stricken out and "$400,000,000" inserted.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line 1607 to insert:

For machinery and fitting up of the new mint building at San Francisco, $18,000, to be available immediately; and for fitting up a refinery in said mint, $34,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line 1611 to insert:

For this amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for repairing and fitting up the old branch-mint building at San Francisco for sub-treasury and other Government offices, $30,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move to insert after the word "dollars" in line 1639 the words:

That the limitation of the cost of the court-house and post-office building at Raleigh, North Carolina, contained in the act of March 3, 1873, is hereby increased to $350,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to insert after line 1639 the following:

That the sum of $100,000 for the erection of a public building for the use of the United States at Covington, Kentucky, appropriated by an act approved February 17, 1873, be, and the same is hereby, continued; and the sum of money authorized to be expended in the construction of said building is hereby fixed at $250,000; and all restrictions as to the materials in said act are hereby repealed; no sum of money in excess of $250,000 shall be expended in the construction of said building; and all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions hereof are hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line 1652:

That the act entitled "An act for the erection of a public building for the use of the United States at Nashville, Tennessee," approved January 24, 1873, be, and the same is hereby, amended so that the sum of money authorized to be expended in the erection of said building is hereby fixed at $377,000; and all restrictions in said act are hereby repealed; and no sum of money in excess of the amount fixed by this act shall be expended in the construction of said building; and all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions hereof are hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. I am authorized to offer the following amendment in the clause making an appropriation for the continuation of the construction of the building for the State, War, and Navy Departments in line 1670:

And for preparation of granite and commencement of the north wing of said building, $250,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in the clause appropriating $150,000 for furniture, repairs, and carpets for public buildings under the control of the Treasury Department, in line 1676 to add the words:

Of this amount $20,000 shall be available immediately.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line 1697 to insert the following clause:

Mint of the United States at Carson: For wages of workmen and adjusters, $20,000; for incidental and contingent expenses, $25,000. And so much of the amounts hereby appropriated for the mint at Carson as may be necessary is made available for the expenditure during the current fiscal year.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. After line 1704 I move to insert:

For incidental expenses of the New York assay office, $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to insert after the amendment just adopted the following:

Loss in the redemption of old copper cents, being the difference between the nominal value of the old copper cents and the value of the same as metal, $7,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out the second section of the bill, in the following words:

That section 9 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1872," approved March 3, 1871, authorizing the President to employ suitable persons to conduct certain inquiries, and to prescribe their duties in respect to appointments in the civil service, be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and the unexpended balance of any appropriation heretofore made for carrying the same into effect shall be covered into the Treasury; that in all the Bureaus and in all Departments at Washington, whenever there shall be a number of applicants for employment therein, a soldier or sailor who fought in the line of duty in war, a soldier's or sailor's widow, wife, daughter, and mother, respectively, being such applicant, shall have preference in the employments suited to each, respectively; and the same rule shall be observed whenever discharges shall take place in the several Departments and Bureaus by reason of diminution of force therein, respectively: Provided, That two persons of the relationship above stated, either by blood or marriage, shall not have employment in any of said Departments or Bureaus at the same time; and it shall be the duty of the officer at the head of each of the Executive Departments at Washington to prescribe and publish rules for ascertaining the qualifications of applicants for appointments at his disposal, or made under his authority, to make such appointments only from candidates who have the qualifications of honesty, efficiency, and fidelity, and not as rewards for mere party zeal, giving preference only to those who have the additional qualification of an honorable record in the military or naval service of the United States, or the widow, wife, daughter, sister, or mother of such soldier, sailor, or marine. And it shall be his further duty to make such appointments as equitably as possible from qualified candidates presenting themselves from the several congressional districts, and with reference to their population; and upon the removal of any appointee, the reason for such removal shall be stated on the records of the Department where the service was rendered.

And in lieu thereof to insert the following:

To enable the President to carry into effect the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1872," approved March 3, 1872, authorizing him to employ suitable persons to conduct certain inquiries, and to prescribe their duties in respect to appointments in the civil service, $15,000.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I want to know how far that goes. Does that restore the civil-service commission?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on striking out the second section and inserting the words printed in italics at the end of the section.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Will it restore the civil-service commission?

Mr. SARGENT. I think it will have an effect in that way.

Mr. ROBERTSON. What is the question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I hope that will not be done. I should like to hear the gentleman having the bill in charge give the reasons for this amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will say a word, as the Senate are evidently not giving their attention to the subject. The second section of the bill as it comes from the House of Representatives repeals the civil-service act. The amendment of the Senate committee strikes out that section and makes an appropriation of $15,000 to carry out the act. That is the whole story.

The question being taken by yeas and nays resulted—yeas 32, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Boutwell, Buckingham, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Edmunds, Fenton, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamlin, Howe, Kelly, McCreery, Merrimon, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Oglesby, Ransom, Sargent, Schurz, Scott, Stevenson, Wadleigh, Washburn, Windom, and Wright—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Carpenter, Chandler, Clayton, Conover, Flanagan, Hamilton of Texas, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Mitchell, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Robertson, Spencer, and Tipton—16.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Bogy, Boreman, Brownlow, Cameron, Conkling, Cragin, Dorsey, Ferry of Connecticut, Ferry of Michigan, Gilbert, Johnston, Jones, Lewis, Logan, Morton, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Stockton, Thurman, and West—25.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and concluded. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to the following section:

SEC. 6. To enable the Secretary of War to carry out the provisions of the act approved April 23, 1874, entitled "An act to provide for the relief of the persons suffering from the overflow of the Lower Mississippi River," and also of the joint resolution authorizing the President to issue Army rations and clothing to the destitute people on the Tombigbee, Warrior, and Alabama Rivers, approved May 28, 1874, the sum of $500,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of purchasing supplies of food to be issued under his direction to any and all classes of destitute or helpless persons living on or near the Lower Mississippi, Tombigbee, Warrior, and Alabama Rivers, who have been rendered so by reason of the recent overflow; and that the Secretary of War make detailed reports to the Congress of the expenditure under this act, and of the act and joint resolution aforesaid: Provided, That the authority hereby conferred upon the Secretary of War shall expire on the 1st day of September, 1874; and none of the moneys hereby or formerly appropriated shall be expended except in cases where the Secretary of War shall be satisfied that there is an actual and pressing case of destitution, and that such destitution is directly caused by said overflow: Provided further, That any balances remaining unexpended from the appropriation provided for in the act of the 23d of April, 1874, aforesaid, may be used for the purposes expressed in either said act or said joint resolution: And provided further, That the Secretary of War may use any of the money hereby or formerly appropriated for the relief of the destitute people upon the Tennessee River when satisfied that their necessities arise from the recent overflow of said river.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENSON. My attention was not called when section 3, on page 72, was read. I want to make an immaterial amendment, to strike out in line 2 the words "inquire into," and insert "request the Choctaw national council to present to him." It makes no difference in the sense but saves the Secretary of the Treasury a great deal of trouble, and it will let these claims come before him as claimed by the national council.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. This does not make any change.

Mr. STEVENSON. It saves the Secretary of the Treasury a large amount of trouble. The Secretary of the Treasury cannot make the inquiry without employing a clerical force, and the Choctaw national council can present their own claims to him.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think that section had better be disturbed. It had better be left as it is.

Mr. STEVENSON. I ask to disturb it because it puts the Secretary of the Treasury to a great deal of unnecessary labor which may end in nothing.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I perfectly understood that the Senator from Kentucky asked to disturb it, and I only expressed my humble opinion that it was not wise to disturb it. It may be that the Senator is right. Here is a disputed claim which has been trundling around through claim agents and lobbyists and other people, which may be right or may not; I express no opinion now on that point; the House of Representatives have sent us a section which directs our own officer upon his own authority and our own, and nobody else's, keeping out all attorneys and all Indians and everybody, to make a certain investigation into it.

Now, I do submit to Senators who are desirous of doing justice to these claimants and who are desirous of doing justice to the Treasury and to the people, that we, not being partisans, not being defendants, but being the grand court of the nation, judging or investigating a claim which is laid before us, the true way to make that investigation is to permit the proper officer, the Secretary of the Treasury, for us, having regard to the rights of all parties, as this section leaves it, and without any limitation or constraint by anybody's presentations or influences or arguments, to inquire into the state of this thing and report to us. That is what the bill as it comes to us provides. That, as it seems to me, and that alone, is the true ground upon which we ought to stand. I think we sometimes forget, when we ought to remember, that we are not defendants or partisans, but we are the tribunal of the people for the purpose of adjusting the rights of the people as against the Treasury and protecting the rights of the people in the Treasury against unjust claims; and therefore, acting impartially in that attitude, it is our mission to make an impartial and uninfluenced inquiry into these circumstances in order that we may know what to do. Therefore I desire that there shall be excluded entirely any report, any claim, anything except the authority of the nation confided to the Secretary of the Treasury independently to make this inquiry in respect to the circumstances, that we may know them. So it is that I think the amendment of my friend from Kentucky ought not to be agreed to.

Mr. STEVENSON. No man will go further than I will with the Senator from Vermont in restricting the expenditures of this Government. During my service with him upon the Committee on Appropriations we were always together on that subject; and if I thought that this amendment in any way committed the Government to this claim, I should at once acquiesce in his views. Now, this section does not commit the Government in any way to the payment of any money, directly or indirectly. Section 3 directs the Secretary of the Treasury to inquire into the amount of liabilities due from the Choctaw tribe of Indians to individuals. I move to amend that by asking the Secretary of the Treasury to request the Choctaw council to present to him the amount of liabilities that they claim to be due them. The only point is whether the Secretary of the Treasury shall undertake to go into a thorough investigation of this claim before he receives from them what they claim, or whether they shall present to him the amount that they claim and then he inquire into it. He is not then to be bound by what they claim, but he is still to inquire into the case with this presentation of their claim before him, and then he is "to report the same to the next session of Congress, with a view of ascertaining what amounts, if any, should be deducted from the sum due from the United States to said Choctaw tribe, for the purpose of enabling the said tribe to pay its liabilities, and thereby enable Congress to provide a fund to be held for educational and other purposes for said tribe."

It seems to me that my amendment is in the interest of economy. The Secretary of the Treasury cannot send special agents to investigate these claims without having a special fund for that purpose. The Secretary of the Treasury intends to remodel the whole Treasury Department, and on the 1st of July to dispense with hundreds of employés now in that service. I ask in this amendment merely that the Choctaw national council shall lay before the Secretary of the Treasury what they claim, not to guide the Secretary of the Treasury, but to let the Secretary have their claim, and then he is to investigate whether that claim is right or wrong in whole or in part, and report to Congress in what particulars their claim is erroneous. But now as the section reads the Secretary is required, without knowing what they claim, himself to institute this inquiry and to report. The result would be that he would not have half the information that it seems to me he would have if the Choctaw council were to present this claim to him. It is a mere verbal change.

Mr. BOUTWELL. It seems to me that the section as it comes from the House of Representatives is in the true form. The Secretary of the Treasury is directed to inquire into the amount of liabilities due from the Choctaw tribe of Indians to individuals. The proposition of the Senator from Kentucky is to request the Choctaw tribe of Indians to state it, a very different proposition. If the Secretary of the Treasury makes the inquiry, it will be in the nature of an examination of the claims of individuals against the Choctaw Nation, which in a certain sense by the twelfth and thirteenth articles of the treaty of 1855, the Government agreed to provide for the payment of. A statement from them may be true or it may be false. The difference to the Government and the difference to the Choctaw Nation is that if it shall be found upon the whole that there is anything due to the Choctaw tribe of Indians, and the amount so found exceeds the liability due from the tribe to individual claimants against the tribe, the balance is to be set aside for educational and other purposes. Therefore it is a matter of consequence to the parties and of consequence to the Government to know with some degree of precision the amount of these liabilities which cannot be ascertained with any certainty from a mere statement by the council or leading persons in the tribe. I hope, for one, that the provision will remain as it came from the House.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. This is an old question, somewhat familiar to some of us. It is a very delicate and difficult question between the two branches. The House of Representatives have made a distinct proposition, the design of which is to furnish Congress with accurate information upon this subject. If we amend it, it leads to complications. I hope the Senate will concur with the action of the House and settle the matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky.

The amendment was rejected—ayes 8, noes not counted.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1572) to amend the several acts providing a national currency and to establish free banking, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 2655) to provide for the establishment of life-saving stations and houses of refuge upon the sea and lake coasts of the United States, and to promote the efficiency of the life-saving service;

A bill (S. No. 375) for the benefit of the Kentucky Agricultural and Mechanical Association;

A bill (S. No. 688) referring the claim of the owners of the schooner Ada A. Andrews to the Court of Claims;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 112) directing the Public Printer to keep an account of all expenditures for printing, mailing, and binding the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, &c.;

A bill (H. R. No. 1572) fixing the amount of United States notes, providing for a redistribution of the national-bank currency, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2089) for the relief of Mrs. Louisa P. Molloy.

SUSAN B. ANTHONY.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask permission of the Senator in charge of this bill to make a report, which has been delayed, from the Judiciary Committee, not for action, but to go on the Calendar.

I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of Susan B. Anthony, praying for remission of a fine; and to whom also was referred the bill (S. No. 391) to enable Susan B. Anthony to pay a fine imposed upon her by the circuit court for the northern district of New York, to report, asking to be discharged from the further consideration of the petition and recommending that the bill be indefinitely postponed, for the reason that the committee are not satisfied that the ruling of the judge presiding at the trial of the petitioner in the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of New York was precisely as represented by the petitioner; and secondly, that whether so or not, the committee do not find it to be within their province to inquire into and review the judgments of the courts of the United States in matters that are properly before them; and the petitioner, if she believes her conviction to have been erroneous, can apply to the executive department, which alone has the power to grant pardons for any relief to which she may be entitled.

Mr. CARPENTER. I ask leave to present the views of the minority of the Judiciary Committee upon this same memorial and bill, and request that they be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) That order will be made if there be no objection.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WADLEIGH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of A. G. Batchelder and Mrs. Alsie F. Thompson, of Lowell, Massachusetts, praying an extension of a patent on an improvement in railroad car-brakes, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was ordered to be printed, and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the memorial.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 525) to authorize the Commissioner of Patents to receive and entertain an application of William Beale Hale, for letters-patent, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was indefinitely postponed.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALCORN and Mr. CHANDLER submitted amendments intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. No. 3600) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

COMMITTEE ON CONTINGENT EXPENSES.

Mr. CARPENTER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate have leave to sit during the recess of the Senate.

INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. CLAYTON. I should like to take up the following resolution reported yesterday by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PATTERSON:]

Resolved, That the Select Committee on the Levees of the Mississippi River be authorized to sit during the recess, and to investigate and report upon the condition of the levees of the Mississippi River; also upon the propriety of the Government of the United States assuming charge and control of the same, with a view to their completion and maintenance, and that the expenses attending this investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, upon vouchers approved by the select committee aforesaid.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I make the point of order that that is legislation against the special rule we adopted on this subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator offer it as an amendment to the appropriation bill?

Mr. CLAYTON. O, no. I ask for the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I beg pardon.

Mr. CLAYTON. I ask the consent of the Senator from Kentucky to call this up now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a resolution offered some days ago, and the Senator calls it up now with the consent of the Senator from Kentucky, who had the floor on the appropriation bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read again. I do not understand what the thing is.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Let that go over for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3600) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes.

Mr. STEVENSON. I offer an amendment from the Committee on Appropriations, after line 711, on page 30, to insert:

That the salary of the special policeman in the office of the Secretary of the Senate shall hereafter be $1,296, and a sum sufficient to pay the increase hereby made be, and the same is hereby, appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENSON. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to offer another amendment:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay the late firm of Dempsey & O'Toole, as indemnity for loss sustained by them by annulment of a contract with the Post-Office Department for furnishing stamped envelopes and newspaper wrappers, the sum of $29,433.80: Provided, That previous to the payment of the sum before mentioned, the said Dempsey & O'Toole shall deliver up, to the satisfaction of the Postmaster-General, all dies and dandy-rolls by them used and provided for the manufacture of the envelopes aforesaid: And provided further, That the sum aforesaid shall be received in full satisfaction for all claims and demands of the said Dempsey & O'Toole for or by reason of the annulment of said contract.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee in charge of this bill if that amendment is in order?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It was considered in committee while I was in the Chamber.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not the question. I ask the chairman, not whether it is meritorious; we have had it up here year after year; we all understand what it means; but I ask my friend from Maine whether it is in order to move that amendment on this bill in his judgment?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. This is the first time my attention has been called to it, and I do not know whether it is or not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I make the point of order that is a private claim which has been ruled out forty times.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I offer the following amendment. On page 10, line 218, after "postage-stamps," I move to insert the following:

For each Senator and member of Congress, $300; and.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Does that come from any committee? If not, I raise the point of order.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I offered the amendment several days ago, and had it printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The rule requires, if I recollect it, that an amendment to an appropriation bill to be in order must be proposed by the authority of a committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HOWE. I offer the following amendment to come in after line 332:

For commencing the construction of a new building for the Library of Congress, $200,000: Provided, That no expenditure for ground shall be incurred; and the Joint Committee on the Library of Congress, together with the Librarian of Congress, shall have supervision of the location and erection of said building; and said committee is hereby authorized to sit during the recess of Congress.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I raise the point of order on that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state the point of order.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Does it come from a committee?

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir; I move it by direction of the Joint Committee on the Library.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I think the Senate ought to be informed in relation to the full effect of this amendment, if it should be adopted, and I hope that the Senator from Wisconsin has not set his heart upon it, for I know how difficult it will be to resist him if he has. The point in the case is that there is no spot yet designated for the location of the Library building. To be a suitable structure it ought to be half or two-thirds as large as the present Capitol building, and will cost five or six million dollars. I do not think at present that the sentiments of the House and the Senate are agreed upon any spot which would be appropriate for the location of this building. Of course this amendment appropriates but $200,000; but it does not fix the point where the Library shall be located, but it involves the whole amount necessary. I do think it is too important a question to be submitted to anybody but the entire Congress. I have, with the Senator from Wisconsin, labored and studied much on this subject, and I find a wide diversity of opinion as to where this building should be placed. It seems to me, therefore, that it is better for us to defer it until the next session and have it then fully determined and decided upon. I am much in favor of building a library, and building one that is appropriate, to last for centuries, and when it is built I want a proper building and to have it placed in the proper place.

Mr. STEVENSON. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont whether he has ever had a plan and estimate of a proper library building, which will hold several million volumes?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. There have been various plans submitted and competed for, and the commission that was authorized decided in favor of making an award to three plans according to their several merits, first, second, and third, and they vary in cost from three to seven millions I think. I suppose we cannot build a structure such as we ought to have for less than five or six millions at the very least.

Mr. STEVENSON. If a library building is to cost from five to six millions, or probably ten millions, I do not think the Senate ought to take any step till we determine where it is to be located, the plan of the building, and its cost. We had a lecture read to us last night in the discussion of the pension bill upon the want of money in our Treasury. That was urged against the widows of those poor old soldiers, who if they did no other act certainly helped to save New Orleans from as great an army as England ever sent to this country. That bill was opposed even by the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. WEST,] upon the ground that the Treasury was in too poor a condition even to let the country express its gratitude to the survivors and the widows of the deceased heroes of that war. I have not a word to say on that subject. I think the Treasury does want vigilant guarding; and therefore it is in the view of economy that I rise to say, without antagonizing with anybody, that I think the suggestions of the Senator from Vermont are entirely correct; that before beginning to lay the foundation of a library building, which I think the Government ought to have, two considerations ought to guide us: first, its location; and, secondly its cost.

If we undertake to put the library on Judiciary Square, which seems to be the favorite project, then the Congressional Library will ultimately sink into a library for the city of Washington; and if we want books we shall have to send several squares to get them. I do not intend to express my opinion about it. I am perfectly willing to let the Committee on the Library take this matter in charge before we spend any money, and let them report to us the plan and the location and the cost. That it seems to me would be the most sensible plan, and to that extent I shall go, and no further, now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The question is first whether the present necessities of our accumulation of books, pamphlets, &c., require us to take measures for larger accommodations. There is no question, I believe, on that subject. Any gentleman who will go into the library-rooms of the Capitol now will see that they have become really store-rooms where you can get at nothing or do nothing in the broad sense because the place is entirely inadequate to the very valuable and increasing collections of our gathering that are laid in there. There are more than forty thousand volumes, as I am advised by a friend who always makes the proper suggestions to me at the right time, now unable to be shelved or put in condition where gentlemen of Congress and of the country can have accesss to them. Therefore it is plain that we ought to do something and we ought to do it now.

The question is how are we to do it? We must trust somebody. Are you to undertake in this body and in the House of Representatives to determine by discussion and by a vote where you will locate these accumulations or these books—for I think they ought all to be kept together except the duplicates, which may be stored away somewhere. The Library as a library ought to be kept where the hand of every gentleman in Congress can be laid upon it in the shortest possible time, and where the very competent gentleman now in charge or any successor he may have (and I hope that time may be far off) can give us the proper reference and to furnish the proper volume at a moment's notice, because in legislation that is what we must have. I say, then, if consistently with architectural propriety we can have this library provided in the immediate vicinity of the great dome that overshadows this Capitol, we ought to do it If it shall be found impossible and inconsistent with the architectural beauty and decency of this grand building to do that thing, then we must take the nearest and best place that we can, because it is impossible to go on in the present condition of affairs and have the Library of any use to anybody. It is crowding itself to death; it is being strangulated by itself. That is what the truth is.

As I said upon this question of the how and the why we must trust somebody. If the Senate is willing to trust the Joint Committee on the Library in respect to providing these accommodations, then, speaking for myself as one member of that committee, I say that I should strain a point in order that this collection of books should be kept where they are as they ought to be, the companions, the instructors, at our very elbow all the time, of the Senators and Representatives and other officers of the Government who are sent here to take care of the people's interests who require those books for information and for reference; and speaking my individual opinion, I have no hesitancy in saying, from some study of the subject, that there will be found not the difficulty that is supposed by some gentlemen in locating a place for the library, where it will be not only a grand addition to the beauty of this edifice, but also as accessible as it is now.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I want to add one word to what the honorable Senator from Vermont has just said in reference to the necessity of having additional accommodations for your library somewhere and soon. As he has remarked, there are some forty thousand volumes which your industrious Librarian cannot shelve, and through your annual appropriations, small as they are, and through the operations of your copyright laws, you are adding to that number from thirty to forty thousand volumes annually.

Now, Mr. President, a book is not of much value unless it is accessible; and when a book is buried under tons of books it is not so accessible as it is when it is placed on shelves forty rods off. It is therefore indispensable, if you mean to have the use of your library, that you should have additional accommodations for it. It is one of the necessities, not a luxury, not a convenience merely, not a condition; it is a necessity of the country, as it seems to me.

As has been remarked, if these two Houses refuse to enter upon the work of providing these additional accommodations until they shall have agreed where to place the building, what plan to build upon, and what shall be the limit of the expenditures, before they have come to an agreement upon each of these points, your library will be almost useless from the very accumulation of buried volumes. That did not seem to be at all practicable. So the Library Committee instructed me to move this amendment. If the Senator from Vermont who sits farthest from me [Mr. MORRILL] thinks it is so certain that the library building should be placed at some point and nowhere else, it is very easy to take the sense of the Senate upon that question. Let him make his proposition. If any other Senator here has a distinct proposition, a distinct point to name, we can get the sense of the Senate right here upon that proposition. The Library Committee had no such point to propose; I had not. I should be very glad to get the advice of the Senate in reference to all these matters.

Let me say to the honorable Senator from Kentucky, however, that if you knew just where the building was to be, and what the plan of it was, it would be utterly impossible to set limits to its cost. That cannot be done. No architect can do it; no builder can do it. But I was a little surprised that my honorable friend from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] having paid as much attention to this subject as he has, should venture to say that the cost of the building would be $6,000,000, and still more surprised when the honorable Senator from Kentucky said he thought it would cost ten millions. Why, Mr. President, this magnificent pile in which we are to-day has only cost $13,000,000. We have had submitted to us during the past summer some twenty-six or twenty-eight different plans for a library building. The estimated cost under those plans runs all the way from $800,000 to $3,400,000; the highest estimate, if I remember correctly, of the most expensive was $3,400,000.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I thought it was more.

Mr. HOWE. I think I am not mistaken; I may be; but it is about that. The building should cost a pretty large sum for it should be a credit to the library as well as a credit to the Government providing for the library. I know the honorable Senator frankly does not contemplate anything short of one of the completest collections of books to be found on the face of the globe, and I know he is among those who are ready to furnish ample accommodations. The labor of constructing the building must be a work of years; and it seemed to the committee—I hope it will be the judgment of the Senate—that we cannot commence that work too soon.

I agree with my honorable friend, my colleague on the Library Committee, if there is any other tribunal here that the Senate would prefer to trust, I should be entirely willing and be glad to have that tribunal suggested, and be very glad to have it substituted. I do not think any member of the Library Committee cares to assume this responsibility; but it is a responsibility that Congress must take itself and execute itself, or it must intrust it to somebody. That is inevitable. I shall be glad to hear any suggestion, any proposition, to get any light.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Will my honorable friend allow me to make one suggestion and see if we cannot compromise so as to facilitate the objects with which I am in sympathy. I agree entirely with what has been said about the necessity of a library building, and at once. I do not think there is any question about that by anybody who has looked into the subject for a moment; and I believe that the structure of the building should be under the supervision of the Committee on the Library, acting conjointly with the Librarian.

On the other proposition of location I think it probably belongs to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, who have by instruction of the Senate jurisdiction, so to speak, of public buildings and grounds. They ought best to understand what can be granted for this purpose with due deference to such other buildings as may in the future be needed in the District. Now, I submit this twofold proposition then, as embodying those two ideas:

For commencing the construction of a new building for the Library of Congress, the supervision of which shall be under the Joint Committee on the Library, $200,000; and the Joint Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds are directed to designate a suitable location therefor, and report the same to Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator offer that as an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not offer it as an amendment, because I do not want to push myself forward on this question. I only suggest that as a proper solution of the question.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I am very sure the Committee on Public Buildings do not desire any part of the responsibility of this undertaking. The difficulty about this phraseology is that it provides "that no expenditure for ground shall be incurred." It follows as a matter of course that we have either got to have somebody give us the ground or we are to take the ground that we now possess. I do not think myself that we have any appropriate ground for this magnificent structure that we ought to have. The only ground that could be used would be an extension of the west or east front of the Capitol or the grounds in front of the Capitol, between here and the Smithsonian grounds, or the park on the east side, or some of the squares that are in the city. All of these squares are altogether too far off.

This Library has grown up under the most excellent management of the present Librarian to be one of the first libraries in the world. I desire that it shall be continued under the prestige of the old name, the Congressional Library, and that it shall be placed near the Capitol building, so as to be accessible to both members of the House and of the Senate. If the Joint Committee on the Library were to designate an extension of this Capitol building in the center, on either side, east or west, I should regard it as absolutely destructive to the symmetry and fair proportions of this the best public building, perhaps, that any government possesses. But there is no proposition that this committee may have an opportunity to get any other ground than they can get without expense.

I should regard it of quite as much importance that this building should have a suitable location as that it should be of suitable proportions and dimensions for the accommodation of the books that in the next half-century or century it will be required to hold. Although I am not wedded to any one particular spot, I think if it were located upon one of the squares on the east side of the Capitol, say, the square where Judge Field lives and the buildings that are occupied by him and others in that vicinity well known to all Senators, that would place the Library within one square of the Capitol; it would be easily accessible; we could send a page at any moment there; and when Senators or members of the House came here with their families, they could easily stop at one place or the other. The building will be an imposing one, and it ought not to be placed right in the shadow of the Capitol to distract attention from this building, and therefore it ought not to be in the park on the east front.

Mr. HOWE. Will my friend allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Certainly.

Mr. HOWE. I know very well he does not mean to oppose this, but I ask him why he does not submit his proposition to strike out the words forbidding any expenditure of money in the purchase of grounds so that we may take the sense of the Senate upon that one question? That would settle one point.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I know that the Senate might defeat separate propositions one by one, but I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the general proposition as proposed here, and this proposition is that no expenditure shall be incurred for ground. Therefore the committee clearly contemplate building on some ground that we now have.

Mr. HOWE. Yes, Mr. President, the committee thought that Congress would be more willing to embark in erecting a library on some ground already owned than to purchase more ground; but that was a mere opinion. I do not care one snap about that provision myself. I am quite willing, if it is thought better to purchase a piece of ground, to see it done, and I should be very glad to have the Senator move that amendment and see what the sense of the Senate is. I will not oppose it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. These squares upon the east of the Capitol are so largely cut up by streets and avenues that if the Government were to buy them they would have to pay for but little more than one-half the ground in the whole. I think that in the process of time we shall need the whole of those squares; that it will be necessary to build in a few years a building for a national museum of natural history.

But, Mr. President, I only desire to present the whole case to the Senate. It is a grave and important question. I desire to see this library successfully kept up and the present Librarian retained as long as he shall be able to discharge the duties. It seems to me, however, that if we shall go off upon any distant square and separate the great bulk of the library from Congress we shall do a very vicious act.

Mr. STEVENSON. I desire to say but a word on this subject. I am perfectly willing to trust the Joint Committee on the Library with almost anything within the scope of their power; but I still adhere to my original opinion that Congress ought to be chary in making any appropriations for a library until they know exactly where that library is to be. I said that it was proposed to erect a library building at a cost of $6,000,000. The honorable Senator from Wisconsin was surprised at my estimate. It was not my estimate. It was the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings before the Committee on Appropriations that it would require six millions.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. If the Senator from Kentucky will permit me, it is possible that I was mistaken in that. I spoke from recollection, and I know that my own convictions were, when I was studying the subject and looking over the different plans, that by the time it was completed we should not get off for less than about five or six millions.

Mr. STEVENSON. I frankly confess I should like to have the judgment of Congress as to whether the library is to quit this building. If it be possible, and I think it very possible, that such an extension of this Capitol can be made as will not interfere with its architectural beauty, and will accommodate the nation with a library worthy of it——

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It will not accommodate it for more than twenty years.

Mr. STEVENSON. I believe this Capitol can be enlarged so as to give sufficient library room looking to our progress in the next twenty years, and I would make that a condition precedent. Why, sir, we are now erecting an enormous building for the accommodation of the War, Navy, and State Departments; and yet in this very appropriation bill we have been buying lots after lots for the War Department. There is scarcely an appropriation bill, notwithstanding the immense amounts of money which are yearly expended in public buildings here, that these Departments do not go outside of the public buildings and buy lots and buildings here, there, and everywhere.

I have only two objects in view in this matter. I desire to do what the learned Senators representing the Committee on Public Buildings and the Library Committee say they desire to provide for the present exigency which is upon us, of taking care of the books in the library. It was contemplated that the library should be fire-proof and it was fire-proof; and yet the necessity of providing room for the books has compelled the Librarian, I believe, to bring two hundred cases of wood into that library, subject to the danger of fire, which it was the object of Congress to prevent. Therefore I agree with them as to the necessity of taking some action in this regard; but I desire to obtain an expression of the opinion of the Senate so that the Committee on the Library can understand what the sentiment of the Senate upon the question, whether if we can accomodate the library and still retain it in this Capitol, it is not their wish that it should be done.

I have had no experience on this subject; I am one of the humblest Senators on this floor; but I have given some thought to this subject; and while I am willing to provide for a large library, it is not by any means, as the Senator from Vermont seemed to think, equal to some of the libraries in the world. But, sir, it will be a library worthy of America, and I want to retain it in the Capitol if possible. If that cannot be done, I wish to see it located as near the Capitol building as possible. I think the Committee on the Library should, if possible, bring it within this building, rather than place it outside; but if they are compelled to go outside, then I want it so near as the distinguished Senator from Vermont said so well and so eloquently, that the purpose of the library shall not be lost to the nation in cutting us off from the consultation of the books in the library, which would be the case if it were removed any distance from the Capitol.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I agree very nearly with the opinion expressed by the Senator from Kentucky, and I should like to see this amendment changed so as to authorize the Committee on the Library to enlarge the existing library or construct a new one. I believe if this library could be made to last for twenty years here in the building it would be a great gain. My opinion is that you could very much improve this beautiful structure by extending the library, not too far in front, and by making the base for the immense dome, the beautiful dome of this Capitol, larger and better; for if there is any defect in the architecture of this building that is the defect. Then to meet further exigencies, to have a place where you could have your copyright books which you do not need for constant reference, I would have not so expensive and ornate a building; but I would have a plain, fire-proof, graceful structure, near at hand, in which books that we do not want constantly to use could be placed, and thus relieve the accumulation of volumes in the library itself here at the Capitol.

Mr. CARPENTER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) I hope the amendment offered by my colleague will prevail. I have no objection to the change suggested by the Senator from Vermont to take away the restriction as to purchasing new ground, and I am not entirely certain that some provision should not be made about the Capitol as suggested by the Senator from New Jersey, to change the central portion of it, and perhaps make provision for the library there; but it is evident that something must be done, and done at once, for the library is being absolutely snowed under with books and will very soon come to a condition where from its own wealth it will be entirely useless.

That library should be in fact what it is in name—it should be the Congressional Library. It should be accessible to members of Congress; it should be where we could reach it in a very few moments for any volume we want, and that not only requires space enough to put the books up so that their location can be known, but it requires that the building or place, whichever it is, shall be located near the Capitol, and we must begin to act on this subject. I am entirely willing to trust the subject to the Committee on the Library; indeed it seems to me it properly belongs there, that the responsibility belongs to them, and they can safely be trusted to exercise it. I shall vote for the amendment as it has been proposed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. A single word in reference to the point suggested by the Senator from New Jersey. He suggests that there can be ample accommodations provided here for a few years by enlarging the Capitol on the east or west fronts. The eastern front evidently has got to be enlarged within a few years. It should be enlarged to carry out the symmetry of the building; but it will not do to carry out that central front more than a small space beyond the two wings. The front on the western side it would be well enough to have carried out a little farther; but there is no particular necessity for it, and if it should be, it could not be carried out properly more than forty or fifty feet, and therefore it would furnish the most meager amount of addition to the present library.

Under the circumstances it seems to me eminently proper that the Joint Committee on the Library should be looking out for a new library building, for if we attempt any patch-work now, it will be but a few years before we shall be compelled to do this very work that we ought to do now or soon. The only thing that struck me about it was that it is a new subject, and that there was a wide diversity of opinion as to where this building should be located. My only desire is that it shall be placed where it will best accommodate Senators and members of the House. I do not desire to make this a national library, so called, to which we shall contribute something niggardly every year, but make it a part and parcel of Congress, something belonging to Congress; and it seems to me that it cannot be unless it is located near this Capitol. I do not regard the expenditure of a small sum or even a large sum for the purchase of the site of such a building as this, that is to stand for centuries, to be a fire-proof building and to contain what is the very apple of the eye of most Senators, good books; but I do desire that it shall be so placed that there shall hereafter be no regrets.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The question is on the amendment.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. Let it be reported again.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, which was to insert after line 332 the following:

For commencing the construction of a new building for the Library of Congress, $200,000: Provided, That no expenditure for ground shall be incurred; and the Joint Committee on the Library of Congress, together with the Librarian of Congress, shall have supervision of the location and erection of said building; and said committee is hereby authorized to sit during the recess of Congress.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I will venture, as the Senator from Wisconsin does not do it himself, to suggest an amendment. I really do not wish to interfere, but I will venture to move to strike out after the word "that," to the end of the line; so that the proviso will read:

Provided, That the Joint Committee on the Library, together with the Librarian of Congress, shall have supervision of the location and erection of said building.

Mr. HOWE. How much do you propose to strike out?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. All that limits you about the location.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be reported.

Mr. HAMLIN. I suggest to the Senator from Vermont that it would be more in harmony, and put the amendment in a better form to strike out the words "provided that no expenditure for ground shall be incurred." It will then read:

For commencing the construction of a new building for the Library of Congress, $200,000; and the Joint Committee on the Library of Congress, &c.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I accept the suggestion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know but that the words "new building" necessarily excludes the idea of enlarging the present library for the time being. I do not think it ought to be excluded. If we are to take this responsibility, we either ought to take it under instructions that the Senate itself perfectly agrees upon, so that we all understand what it means, or else we ought to have a free hand about it. If these words are intended to mean that under all circumstances we are compelled to locate a building somewhere else, and we cannot enlarge this at all, or have any discretion about that, then I for one, as a member of that committee, wish to understand it now. If, on the other hand, it is confided to the discretion of the committee, consulting with my honorable colleague, the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, touching its effect upon the architecture of this building and so on, to see how we can enlarge it for the time being, for the twenty years spoken of by my friend from New Jersey, then I think the language ought to be a little different, because taking the term in its natural sense a "new building" might seem to imply that it was to be totally separate and distinct and removed from the existing structure. That is begging a question which ought to receive the most careful consideration. Therefore I would suggest to modify that so as to leave out the word "new."

Mr. HOWE. The criticism, I guess, is just; but let us dispose of the other amendment first.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I thought I was speaking to the pending amendment. If I was not I will withdraw my speech.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to the amendment as modified.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. In reference to the suggestion of my colleague, and also the suggestion of the Senator from New Jersey, I desire to say this: that whenever we have a façade on the west side or on the east side it will take a great deal more money than $200,000 to build it and reface it with marble, and I should be utterly opposed to making an appropriation so small as $200,000 for any such purpose. Whenever it is done it ought to be done in a single year, or two years at the outside.

Besides, I cannot consent without a protest to the idea that you can get any sufficient accommodations for this library by making any extension here. It would last only for a very brief time, and we would have all the work to do over again, and I am quite sure that the beauty and symmetry of this building would be destroyed by attaching any long extension on either side. If you put it upon the west side, you would have a Swiss cottage, one end of it two or three stories high and the wings only half a story high. It seems to me that we ought to preserve the perfection of this building as much as possible, and I trust there will be no one in favor of an extension upon the west side, for the very small amount of accommodations that could be obtained there would be utterly contemptible in a very short process of time.

Mr. WRIGHT. I understand the question is on the amendment as it has been amended?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the pending question.

Mr. WRIGHT. I feel pretty well satisfied myself that the Senate is hardly prepared to enter upon this scheme, and so far as an appropriation is concerned of $200,000, I am in favor of something of this kind, and have been, I may say, ever since I have had a seat in this body. Something near about two years since I offered a resolution instructing the Committee on the Library, or some committee, to inquire into the propriety of erecting such a building, and to give it the name of the Washington Library Building. Now, inasmuch as this proposition is made at this time, coming from the committee, and I do not know that any others are opposed to the enlargement of the room or a new building, it has occurred to me that the better way was to have some investigation on the subject and have a report, and upon that report let the Senate act. I therefore propose as a substitute for the amendment, if it be in order, what I will read, for I am very well satisfied the Secretary would not be able to read it if I were to send it up:

That the Joint Committee on the Library, together with the Librarian of Congress, inquire into the necessity of commencing the construction of a new building for the Congressional Library or of enlarging the present rooms or building, as also upon what terms new ground can be obtained and the probable cost of the new building or enlargement, and report at the next session of Congress.

Several SENATORS. That is right.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will suggest to the Senator to insert after the word "building," where it is first used, the words "or both."

Mr. WRIGHT. I have no objection to any amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will my friend allow me to look at his amendment? [After examining it.] I wish my friend would reduce this to English, so that we could all read it. It is too much for me. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOWE. I wish my friend from Iowa would withdraw that amendment. It will evidently save the Secretary a good deal of trouble, if nobody else. I think it will save me some. Is it not manifest to my friend, is it not manifest to everybody, that the Library Committee will be able to tell you nothing next winter about the necessity of additional accommodations that we cannot tell you now? We can tell you enough to-day. Put us on the stand, and if you are ready to hear a case, we can make a case showing the absolute necessity for undertaking this work.

Now, then, the Senator would instruct us in addition to that to report the cost of grounds. What grounds? That opens to us an inquiry into the value of every square in Washington, for we cannot assume that this square or that is the one that Congress would agree upon. There are two opinions right here in this body you see to-day as to the question whether you should have a new building or an addition to the present Capitol. We cannot help you to decide that. The Library Committee cannot say a word to make the solution of that question plainer than it is. You severally have your opinions about it. You will have them next winter after all we may say on the subject.

Therefore it seems to me that to agree to this amendment is simply one form of postponing action. You can postpone action by just negativing this amendment, but do not impose any such labor as that on the Library Committee, which would do nobody any good in the world and only vex us. I therefore hope my honorable friend will withdraw the amendment.

The Senator from Vermont sitting nearest to me [Mr. EDMUNDS] just now suggested an amendment which I think myself ought to be made. I say so with deference, considering that I am acting under instructions; but the criticism which he made I do not think occurred to the committee when the amendment was agreed to, and I think it would be an improvement if adopted. I should be very glad to have the sense of the Senate taken upon that; but I really hope the Senator from Iowa will not press his amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. WRIGHT. I will have it in form in a few moments so that it can be read.

CANNON FOR A MONUMENT AT LEXINGTON.

Mr. WADLEIGH. Mr. President, the people of the town of Lexington, in the State of Massachusetts, propose to erect a monument where the first blood of the Revolution was shed, and a bill has passed the House authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver to them ten brass cannon for that purpose. They desire that the bill may be passed at this session, so that they may complete the monument before the centennial anniversary of the battle of Lexington next year. The bill was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, who have authorized me to report it back and to ask its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire asks consent to lay aside informally the pending bill and proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

Mr. WADLEIGH. It is a bill to authorize the Secretary of War to give ten condemned brass cannon to the town of Lexington to build a monument prior to the centennial celebration of the battle of Lexington.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The only objection I have is that cannon for such a noble purpose ought not to be condemned cannon; they ought to be first-rate; but I will waive that objection and let it go.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 3163) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver certain condemned ordnance to the municipal authorities of Lexington, Massachusetts, for monumental purposes.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of War to deliver to the municipal authorities of Lexington, Massachusetts, ten pieces of condemned brass cannon, to be used for monumental purposes in commemoration of the battle of Lexington on the 19th day of April, 1775.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN L. T. JONES.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. There is a bill that I desire to have passed for the benefit of a Mr. Jones, whom all the Senators, I apprehend, know. It will not take three minutes to do it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That will not do. I ask my friend to look at the army on their feet already prepared to make similar requests. Let us go on with the appropriation bill. I will help the Senator by and by.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. It will not take three minutes. Let us dispose of Mr. Jones. The bill is No. 696 on the Order of Business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland asks unanimous consent to lay aside informally the sundry civil bill and take up the bill indicated by him.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. There will be no trouble about it at all.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1620) for the relief of John L. T. Jones, of Montgomery County, Maryland, for rent and damage sustained by the destruction of a dwelling-house by accidental fire while the same was being occupied by United States troops for quarters.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to John L. T. Jones the sum of $4,000, which shall be in full discharge of all claims of said Jones against the United States for rent of building and destruction of the same by accidental fire while being so occupied as quarters by the United States troops in Montgomery County, Maryland, under the command of General Hubert Ward, in November, 1862.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3600) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the precise question on that bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WRIGHT] to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have the amendment stated, so that we may understand exactly how it stands.

Mr. WRIGHT. I will read it as I have now prepared it, and then send it up to the desk.

Mr. STEVENSON. I understand the Senator from Iowa to offer his amendment as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEVENSON. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin before the substitute is acted upon.

Mr. WRIGHT. Let me read it. The substitute is this:

That the Joint Committee on the Library, together with the Librarian of Congress, inquire into the necessity of commencing the construction of a new building for the Congressional Library, or of enlarging the present rooms or building, or both, as also upon what terms suitable ground can be obtained, and the probable cost of the new building, or enlargement or both, and report at the next session of Congress.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the indulgence of the Senate for a moment on this bill. There is an amendment made necessary by the passage of what is called the currency bill. An amendment has been handed to me which I desire to offer, and to which I think there can be no objection. It is apparent on its face. I am compelled to leave the Chamber to attend a committee of conference, and that is the reason I interpose now, although I am a little out of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio asks unanimous consent to lay aside the pending amendment and proceed to the consideration of an amendment offered by him. The Chair hears no objection. The amendment will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

For the following clerks in the office of the Comptroller of the Currency: two clerks of class three; two clerks of class one; nine female clerks; for extra compensation to four heads of divisions, $2,400; total in all $16,100: Provided, That the amount appropriated shall be reimbursed to the Treasury by the national banks, as provided in section 3 of "an act fixing the amount of United States notes, providing for the redistribution of the national-bank currency, and for other purposes."

Mr. SHERMAN. I will say to the Senate that this money does not come out of the Treasury, but comes out of the national banks. It is to provide for the appointment of clerks made necessary in the assorting of national-bank notes. That is all there is of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is now ten minutes to six o'clock. I move that the Senate take a recess until half past seven o'clock.

Several SENATORS. Say eight o'clock.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do you all say eight? ["Yes."] Very well, then, I will say eight o'clock.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I want to be heard about that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is not debatable, but I do not object to the Senator stating his objection.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Then I want to make a suggestion. We ought not to take a recess, in my judgment. If we do, I think we shall find it to be necessary to stay here another day. If we conclude this bill and send it to the House of Representatives by eight o'clock, in season to be acted upon there, and a conference ordered, on Monday morning we can bring this bill into the two Houses ready to finish it on the conference report. If we take a recess and come back here at half past seven or eight o'clock, the consideration of this bill will run into midnight, and the session will run into Tuesday necessarily. Therefore, I hope the Senate will stand by the bill and sit right straight on.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator in charge of this bill thinks the public interest requires that we should stay here now, I withdraw my motion.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I would not say so if I did not sincerely feel that it was so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont withdraws his motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I take the judgment of the Senator from Maine. Now I hope we will go ahead

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I have one objection to that, and it lies at the door of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. If he will yield the appropriation to which I refer I have nothing to say. I understand that a bill is pending awaiting the signature of the President establishing life-saving stations. The Committee on Appropriations is unwilling to appropriate for that object until that bill is signed by the President. As I understand, the President will return here at about ten o'clock and the bill will probably be signed then. If we go right on with this bill it will be concluded before that time and this appropriation will be shut out. There seems to be no objection whatever to the bill and doubtless it will be signed, and I trust the committee will allow the proper appropriation to be made. It is for the saving of life.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The committee have entertained that proposition.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is no question of that kind now before us. Let us have the pending amendment.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I am addressing myself to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and I wish to be heard.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will say, in answer to the Senator's inquiry, that the committee have entertained that proposition and will have it ready the moment they have any information that the bill to which he has referred has become a law and put it on this bill. That can be done at any time before the bill passes from the cognizance of either branch. If the President does not choose to sign the bill, of course we cannot put on an appropriation to carry it out.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Will it be entertained as between the two Houses so as to be subject to the action of the committee of conference?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If the information that that bill has become a law should reach the House before they act upon our amendments, they can put on the appropriation there.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Unless either House acts upon it then, it will not be a subject of controversy to be considered by the conference committee?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The House have as deep an interest in it as we have, and they are very vigilant on that subject. If the President signs that bill before this one leaves either House, we can put the appropriation on this bill, and it seems to me that is the only security we have.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. What is the real objection, I will ask the chairman, to allowing the appropriations to be made now? It is a mere question of time.

Mr. SARGENT. I think the amendment the Senator refers to is in the bill. If he will look at page 4 of the bill, I think he will find it there.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. It is on page 4, line 70.

Mr. SCOTT. I wish to offer an amendment if there is none pending.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us have the amendment reported that is pending.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Clerk will report the pending amendment and the amendment to that amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is as follows:

For commencing the construction of a new building for the Library of Congress, $200,000; and the Joint Committee on the Library of Congress, together with the Librarian of Congress, shall have supervision of the location and erection of said building; and said committee is hereby authorized to sit during the recess of Congress.

It is proposed to amend that amendment by substituting for it the following:

That the Joint Committee on the Library, together with the Librarian of Congress, inquire into the necessity of commencing the construction of a new building for the Congressional Library, or of enlarging the present rooms, or building, or both, as also upon what terms suitable ground can be obtained, and the probable cost of a new building, or enlargement, or both, and report at the next session of Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will receive a message from the House of Representatives.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the following bills:

A bill (H. R. No. 1774) for the relief of Matthias Whitehead;

A bill (H. R. No. 3257) authorizing the Secretary of War to sell unserviceable ordnance stores, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 3282) providing for the collection of moneys due the United States from the Pacific Railroad Companies;

A bill (H. R. No. 3354) to legalize entries of public lands under the homestead laws in certain cases;

A bill (H. R. No. 3428) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the payment of horses and other property lost or destroyed in the military service of the United States," approved March 3, 1849;

A bill (H. R. No. 3431) authorizing the Secretary of War to relinquish and turn over to the Interior Department parts of certain reservations in the Territory of Arizona no longer required for military purposes.

A bill (H. R. No. 225) to amend the act entitled "An act to establish a western judicial district of North Carolina;"

A bill (H. R. No. 2539) relinquishing the rights of the United States in certain lands in the State of Michigan; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2988) to provide for the appointment of a commission of engineers to investigate and report a permanent plan for the reclamation of the alluvial basin of the Mississippi River subject to inundation.

The message also announced that the House insisted on its amendment to the bill (S. No. 733) regulating gas-works, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed Mr. W. L. SESSIONS of New York, Mr. CHARLES O'NEILL of Pennsylvania, and Mr. STEVENSON ARCHER of Maryland, managers at the same on its part.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. No. 784) authorizing the transfer of gold mint bars from the bullion fund of the assay office, New York, to the assistant treasurer at New York.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2343) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, further insisted on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, asked a further conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HENRY H. STARKWEATHER of Connecticut, Mr. JAMES B. BECK of Kentucky, and Mr. J. P. C. SHANKS of Indiana, managers at the same time on its part.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WINDOM. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments to the Indian appropriation bill and agree to the conference asked by the House.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to know what the matter is about this Indian bill.

Mr. WINDOM. I will state it, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to ask the Senator from Maine, at whose request we are sitting here to-night on the sundry civil bill, why we do not go on with that bill, in the first place?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It seems to me it is desirable that we should have a conference appointed on the Indian bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well; that being so, I should like to have this matter explained.

Mr. WINDOM. The point of disagreement is with reference to the appropriation for the Apaches in Arizona and New Mexico.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How much did we appropriate?

Mr. WINDOM. The Senate appropriated $700,000. The appropriation last year was $750,000, and the year before $825.000, I think. The committee of conference reduced it to $550,000, the reduced estimate of the Department, and the House disagreed to it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I wish to ask the Senate what attitude we shall be in if we do not agree to the further conference, but stand upon the position we have already taken?

Mr. WINDOM. I ask to have a further conference.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, I see the Senator does; but I want to have the Senate vote and leave it to the House to determine, if it is reduced to that, whether they will accede to this $500,000 or take nothing. That is what I want to have understood. Inasmuch as we are appropriating money out of the Treasury, if the House of Representatives have got to the point that they are willing not to have any appropriation at all and refuse to vote any because we will not appropriate as much as they say, then I think it high time that the Senate should meet them upon that ground.

Mr. SARGENT. We appropriated a little more than they want.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But the committee of conference have agreed to reduce it to $550,000, and when their committee make that report, the House say they will not have it reduced to $550,000; so that I am correct in saying that the point of difference between the two Houses is now that they refuse to agree to this appropriation bill unless we add more money to the appropriation than the committee of the House and the committee of the Senate have agreed would do for this occasion. Now, if we can reach that point and vote, without any further conference on the subject, so as to adhere to our position, I wish to do it. Whether we can or not, the gentleman in charge of the bill can say.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to inquire if the effect of a vote to adhere is not to kill the bill? Of course we do not want to kill the bill, because it would be an immense labor to get the bill up again. Perhaps the better way would be to insist and grant the conference for fear that a vote to adhere would kill the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, it will not kill the bill. I make this motion on the statement of the Senator from Minnesota. It has been suggested by my honorable friend from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] who is extremely familiar with parliamentary law as he is with all other law, that we can reach this point by agreeing ourselves to the report of our committee of conference.

Mr. WINDOM. We have already agreed to it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well; then we have agreed to the report of the committee of conference on our side. Now, the House of Representatives say they do not agree. I move that the Senate insist upon its agreement to the report of the committee of conference and decline the further conference proposed by the House, and then it will be for the House to say whether they will recede, or whether they will still adhere to their determination that they shall take $250,000 more out of the Treasury than we are willing to give or hazard the passage of the bill.

Mr. WINDOM. I do not understand the statement of the Senator from Vermont. The House insists upon a less appropriation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No. The Senator has stated that the conference committee agreed upon $550,000 and the original bill stood at $750,000.

Mr. WINDOM. That was the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now the House declines to agree to that report.

Mr. SARGENT. But they themselves insist on some $400,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I retract all that I have said and am in favor of agreeing with the House.

Mr. SARGENT. If the Senator will allow me, it involves another question which was fully argued and determined by a vote of three-fourths of the Senate. We have rescued the Territory of Arizona from a state of lawlessness; we have made it a quiet, peaceable Territory under the peace policy which has been pursued by the President and enforced by the military arm. We have put the Indians on four reservations on which not a grasshopper is grown. We have told them, "Stay there; if you leave we will shoot you down like wolves." Now, the question is whether we will keep our faith with them. We said that if they staid there we would feed them. To feed them will cost the amount of the revised estimate of the Department, which is but $550,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should be glad to know how it has happened that the United States has put these Indians upon four reservations where not a grasshopper is to be grown, as the Senator puts it.

Mr. SARGENT. It is nevertheless true.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to know from the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, whom we all know to be a humane man, if the Senator from California is correct that we have forced these Indians on a poor, barren reservation? That is what the Senator means when he says there is not a grasshopper there——

Mr. SARGENT. That is what I mean.

Mr EDMUNDS. If it is possible that this nation has driven these Indians, no matter whether they are savage or tame, into a contracted region of country that we call a reservation, where they cannot subsist themselves or pursue agriculture; in other words, if they are penned up in a barren place, I should like to have the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs tell us now, for this is the best possible opportunity, whether that is so, and if it is so, how it happened.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I can hardly say how it happened, because it happened some time ago; but this I believe is true, that the Apaches are on reservations where they are unable by any means at their command to sustain themselves. While they are compelled by law to remain on these reservations, yet we having declined to feed them according to the agreement they have been in a state of starvation, and obliged at times either to starve or leave the reservation for the purpose of obtaining a living. Those I believe are the facts in regard to the Apaches. Whatever mistake we have made cannot be remedied now that I know of; but there is a necessity, if we would retain them and keep them alive, to feed them, otherwise we should put them on a better reservation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It ought to be provided for. It is amazing.

Mr. SARGENT. I call for the question upon insisting and agreeing to the further conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota moves that the Senate further insist on its amendments to the Indian appropriation bill and agree to the conference asked by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore was authorized, by unanimous consent, to appoint the committee; and Messrs. SARGENT, BUCKINGHAM, and GORDON were appointed the conferees on the part of the Senate.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3600) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WRIGHT] to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE.]

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It seems to me that it would be wisest to place this provision as the Committee on the Library want to have it. They have thought of this subject and it has been committed to them; and as they prefer that this amendment should not be adopted, I think we had better so vote.

Mr. WRIGHT. I will state my object in offering the amendment. I had very great doubts from the expression given by the Senate whether the Senate were prepared to adopt the amendment suggested by the Committee on the Library. I thought a fair compromise would be to have this matter go to the committee to consider the question during the recess. My proposition is that they shall examine as to suitable grounds and the probable expense and to report at the next session of Congress. It occurred to me that it were better, in view of the condition of our finances and in view of the apparent indisposition on the part of the Senate to go into this measure at this time, that they should investigate the question and report, and then we could dispose of it at the next session after having a full examination and report. I have no doubt myself as to the necessity of some action on this subject, and I shall vote very cheerfully for the proposition of the committee if it is not deemed by the Senate better to refer it to the committee to investigate during the recess.

Mr. HOWE. I want to remind the Senate once more that the Librarian has been year after year expounding the necessity of this structure and he cannot possibly add anything to what he has testified on the subject. Now, the Senator says he doubts whether the Senate is prepared to agree to this amendment I have offered. Just let him withdraw his proposition for the present and take the sense of the Senate. After my amendment shall have been improved according to the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont, then take the sense of the Senate on that amendment. If they are not willing to agree to it, then we can hear what the Senate has to say on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa. I wish he would do that.

Mr. WRIGHT. I think the better way is to take the sense of the Senate on the proposition I stated. If the Senate is in favor of the proposition of the committee, as a matter of course they will vote this down.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 21, noes 17.

Mr. HOWE. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. SPRAGUE] wants to know what the question is. I wish it could be stated by the Chair, or I will state it myself.

Mr. SPRAGUE. State it yourself.

Mr. HOWE. The Joint Committee on the Library instructed its chairman to move an amendment appropriating $200,000 to commence enlarging the library or building a new library. The Senator from Iowa thinks that we are not sufficiently enlightened about the necessity for these additional accommodations, and therefore proposes as a substitute an amendment which requires the Committee on the library to report next winter upon the necessity of a new library and the cost of it. I have urged him to withdraw that amendment, reminding him that it is utterly impossible for the committee to tell you anything next winter that you do not know to-day. The librarian has been urging this work for several years. His library is cluttered with books that cannot be shelved. Under the operation of the copyright laws and the purchases the accumulations are from thirty to forty thousand volumes per year.

Agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa is simply deciding against taking any step to provide for this want. I really hope if the amendment of the Senator from Iowa should be adopted as a substitute for the amendment I moved, that then the substitute would be negatived, for it seems to me it would be utterly useless, imposing a labor on the committee which can do no good whatever.

Mr. ALCORN. Senators in the vicinity where I sit are entirely satisfied on all points save one. We are entirely satisfied over here that more room is needed for the library and that an extension of the building is necessary. Every one who regards the ratio in which the books of this country are increasing yearly knows that we must have more room, and what will become of the books that will accumulate in the next twenty-five years is a question that I will not undertake to consider just now. But I say we are satisfied in regard to the necessity for more room. That point is fixed. We are satisfied that this $200,000 is only a beginning; and the only difficulty is, where will you locate the building? We simply do not want it located away off somewhere where it will be inaccessible. Where will you locate it? Within the grounds surrounding this Capitol? If you say there is where you are going to locate it, so far as I am concerned I will vote with the Senator from Wisconsin. So far as the $200,000 is concerned, that is a mere beginning. Let it cost $10,000,000. The library must be had; it is a necessity indispensable—something you cannot do without. You must have it, cost what it may. The only point that I am here hesitating upon is as to where the library shall be located.

Mr. HOWE. Let me tell my honorable friend that the Library Committee has taken no action upon that point.

Mr. ALCORN. That is the very point. There is where the shoe pinches. I wish the Library Committee to just indicate where they intend to put this library, because that is a question that we want to talk about.

Mr. HOWE. Now, if my friend will just propose a place——

Mr. ALCORN. I have no place to propose, but I want it within reach of the Capitol, close by; but that is a question that I have not investigated, and I now understand that the Committee on the Library have not investigated it.

Mr. HOWE. The Committee on the Library have not considered that question.

Mr. ALCORN. That is their business, not mine.

Mr. HOWE. It will be yours if you instruct them to do it, but you see how it is right here in the Senate. Here are very decided opinions expressed already that this additional accommodation ought to be obtained by enlarging the Capitol either to the west or the east. On the contrary, my excellent friend from Vermont protests that you must not provide for it in that way. Some Senators have suggested one square near the Capitol; other Senators have suggested another square. I am perfectly willing to settle the question of location right here in the Senate if you will make a proposition. If you will not make a proposition, then I ask you to trust somebody, and I do not care who it is, the Secretary of the Interior, the superintendent of public buildings and grounds, the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. Only take a step; that is what I ask.

Mr. OGLESBY. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has indicated to the Senate a desire to go on with the bill before us, so as to have it completed by eight o'clock. I am a faithful, diligent, persistent participator and listener as that bill is going through the Senate. I have tasted nothing in the way of substantials to rely on since morning. If all these amendments are to be debated on a proposition for the beginning of a new library building, the chairman of the committee must perceive that eight o'clock will arrive long before we can begin to tell whether the new library will be put in the east part of the city, the west part, the north part, or over in Virginia, or here about the Capitol. It is perfectly obvious that the Senators are not in a condition to vote satisfactorily on this question. The Library Committee has been perfectly candid about it, and one of the gentlemen on the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds has been very candid and told us that this $200,000 is but a beginning; it may cost a million, it may cost two millions, it may cost three; it probably will cost five millions, and we have not the remotest idea in voting upon this grave question whether it is to be connected with the Capitol, a part of the Capitol, on the public grounds of the nation, or new grounds to be bought for the purpose. The question is too grave, the subject too important, to be shuffled and scuttled around in this way. I think we had better go to dinner. If I had any hope that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations could go on with his bill and get it through by eight o'clock, I would sit willingly and patiently.

Mr. SARGENT. Let us try.

Mr. OGLESBY. But if these debates are to go on continually, we shall not get through by midnight. I am opposed to this whole library business. I hope it will stand stock still where it is.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, (at six o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) To relieve the Senator from Illinois, I move that the Senate take a recess until eight o'clock.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I wish to say a word.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I only wish to say a word. If Senators do that thing, they do not adjourn on Monday according to my notion of the public business. That is all I have to say.

Mr. CHANDLER. I wish to say that I desire to-night to call up and pass the river and harbor bill, and I shall ask the Senator from Maine to give way to that. I think we can pass it in thirty minutes now.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I merely want to say that if we are to sit up all night we ought to have an opportunity to place ourselves in a position, with a full stomach, where we can stand these big bills.

Mr. SARGENT. We can pass the bill in ten minutes if Senators will let us do so.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 13, nays 34; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Bogy, Ferry of Michigan Hager, Hamilton of Texas, Ingalls, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Oglesby, Pratt, and Robertson—13.
NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Boutwell, Carpenter, Chandler, Clayton, Conover, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Edmunds, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Johnston, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Ramsey, Sargent, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Sprague, Stewart, Washburn, West, and Wright—34.
ABSENT—Messrs. Boreman, Brownlow, Buckingham, Cameron, Conkling, Cragin, Dorsey, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Gilbert, Jones, Kelly, Lewis, Logan, Morton, Norwood, Patterson, Pease, Ransom, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Stockton, Thurman, Tipton, Wadleigh, and Windom—26.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WRIGHT] to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE,] upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. ROBERTSON. By voting for the amendment of the Senator from Iowa do we vote against the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa proposes his amendment as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin. Those in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa will answer "yea," those opposed "nay."

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 27, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bogy, Chandler, Clayton, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Goldthwaite, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hitchcock, Johnston, Jones, McCreery, Merrimon, Morrill of Vermont, Oglesby, Pratt, Ramsey, Ransom, Robertson, Sherman, Washburn, and Wright—27.
NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Bayard, Buckingham, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Howe, Ingalls, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Sargent, Schurz, Spencer, Sprague, and West—15.
ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Boreman, Boutwell, Brownlow, Cameron, Carpenter, Conkling, Conover, Cragin, Dorsey, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Gilbert, Gordon, Harvey, Kelly, Lewis, Logan, Morton, Norwood, Patterson, Pease, Saulsbury, Scott, Stevenson, Stewart, Stockton, Thurman, Tipton, Wadleigh, and Windom—31.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now recurs on the amendment as amended.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President——

Mr. SARGENT. O, let it go.

Mr. HOWE. No; I beg pardon. I hope the Senate will indulge me now by laying this amendment on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin moves to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. HOWE. I will move that in a moment. I ask this as a matter of justice.

Mr. SARGENT. That will dispose of the whole matter.

Mr. HOWE. I have said over and over again that we really cannot do anything that will be of any service. I accept the judgment of the Senate that they do not wish to enter on this work. I abide by that; it is conclusive. I move now to lay the amendment on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. On behalf of the Committee on Appropriations I offer the following amendment, to come in on page 50, after the word "section," on line 1232:

But nothing herein contained shall be construed to affect the present jurisdiction of the Second Comptroller of the Treasury in this class of cases.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to know what that means.

Mr. SARGENT. If you will read the preceding words you will see that the clause devolves certain duties on the Third Auditor of the Treasury, which is a provision of the House bill that the Senate has not changed; but the Second Comptroller has an idea that that provision may dispense with his supervision of that class of cases.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does this add another check?

Mr. SARGENT. It retains the present one, and clears up any obscurity.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And is an additional security against wrong on the Treasury above what this section prescribes?

Mr. SARGENT. That is what we think at any rate. Probably the person who draughted this clause did not intend to dispense with the scrutiny of the Second Comptroller in these matters, but there is a fear that it does do it, and we want to make it clear that it does not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understand the Senator then to say that the effect of this is to require the imprimatur of two officers instead of one for the passage of these claims?

Mr. SARGENT. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then the Senator is right.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. On page 54 I offer an amendment, which is made necessary by the changes which have been made in the pension laws requiring $300,000 for the Army of the United States for this year. I move to insert after line 1323:

For Army pensions and expenses thereof, under the various acts of Congress, $300,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be available immediately.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. I offer another amendment from the Committee on Appropriations and I believe it is the last one we have. It is to come in on page 60, after line 1463:

For the continuation of the work on the new jail in the District of Columbia, $100,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What Department does that come from?

Mr. SARGENT. From the Interior Department.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to see the authority.

Mr. SARGENT. I will give it to you. I have it here in my hand. Does the Senator wish these documents read? [Holding up a bundle of papers.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; I do not. I am satisfied the jail here ought to be enlarged and made as perfect as possible.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I offer the following amendment, to come in after line 849, on page 35:

For the maintenance and support of the Hydrographic Office, including surveys of ocean currents, reefs, and shoals, and incidental expenses, $50,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Where does that come from?

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I will say that it comes with the recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy and is also approved by the Committee on Commerce, and is recommended and strongly urged by the insurance companies and underwriters in New York. I will state still further that this Hydrographic Office prepared within the year ending June 30 last not less that one hundred and nineteen charts and several publications which are useful for seamen, such as instructions, &c., which are regarded as exceedingly important, but they have no means of publishing them. They want two sets of surveyors for service in foreign waters where they make the surveys which relate to reefs, shoals, and dangerous coasts. These maps and charts are interchangeable with like products from foreign countries.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We all understand it.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. If nothing further is necessary to be said I will say no more.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is strongly recommended.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I offer the following amendment to come in on page 54, after line 1317:

For this amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for presents to the Sioux of the Red Cloud and Whetstone or Spotted Tail agencies, on condition that said Indians shall relinquish their right, under treaty stipulation, to hunt in Nebraska, $25,000.

By treaty with these Indians made in 1868 they have the right to hunt in the northern part of Nebraska as far as the Platte River. To these agencies from the northern part of the Sioux country has frequently come down a large number of Sioux who are not easily controlled, and they have come when those who belong to the reservations have been on their hunt. The consequence has been that property has been stolen and murders have been committed at these particular times. It is regarded as very desirable both by the Secretary of the Interior and by the Indian Bureau, as well as by those who have charge of these agencies, that these Indians should relinquish the right to hunt on those plains; and it is for the purpose of persuading them to do so that this amendment is proposed.

I now beg leave to withdraw my objection to the consideration of the resolution offered by the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PATTERSON,] not that I approve of it, but I have no objection to its being considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is not now before the Senate. The sundry civil appropriation bill is pending.

Mr. PRATT. I offer the following amendment, to come in on page 56, line 1358, after the word "dollars:"

Provided, That the clause in the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1874, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1873, in these words: "That no claims against the United States for collecting, drilling, or organizing volunteers for the war of the rebellion shall be audited or paid unless presented before the end of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874," shall not be construed to embrace the claims of States for collecting, drilling, organizing, &c., troops for the United States service

Mr. EDMUNDS. I make the point of order upon that. It is a legislative provision sought to be introduced into this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. PRATT. What shall I understand to be the ruling of the Chair?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. PRATT. That the amendment is in the nature of a legislative provision?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly.

Mr. PRATT. May I inquire of the Chair what rule prohibits that?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It it the rule recently adopted. The rule will be read by the Clerk.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That during the present session it shall be in order at any time to move a recess, and, pending an appropriation bill, to move to confine debate on amendments thereto to five minutes by any Senator on the pending motion, and such motions shall be decided without debate, and no amendment to any such bill making legislative provisions other than such as directly relate to the appropriations contained in the bill shall be received.

Mr. PRATT. Mr. President——

DISTRICT GOVERNMENT.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from Indiana to give way until I make a report. The Joint Select Committee to investigate the Affairs of the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the President's message, received this morning, have directed me to make report. I ask that the report be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The Joint Committee on the Affairs of the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the message of the President relative to "one feature of the bill entitled an 'Act for the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes,'" report:

That the investigation made by this committee discloses the fact that much of the indebtedness proposed to be funded into the bond provided for was created when there was no adequate provision for payment and upon a basis of credit—the contractors understanding at the time that they were to receive evidences of indebtedness, the time of payment of which was uncertain—by reason whereof these evidences were depreciated in value. And while there were no means whereby the committee could determine the matter with absolute certainty, after giving the subject careful consideration, they believe that a bond of the character provided for would be, as a rule, fully equal in value to what the contractors expected to receive under their contracts. Besides this, the funding proposed is permissive and not compulsory. The creditors have all the security they had when the debt was created and in addition the option to accept the bonds provided for. No injustice, therefore, will be done to any creditor who shall take such bonds in lieu of the securities he now holds. The idea that there is anything like repudiation in the bill is a mistake. The bill does not compel any holder of District securities to take bonds for them. It merely gives him the option to do so, or to retain them and receive payment thereof when the District may be able to pay. The changes made in regard to the District government do not discharge or impair its contracts or liabilities. The bill, therefore, is not repudiation, nor is it unjust to any holder of the District securities which may be funded under it. As to small creditors, as such laborers and so forth, the bill contemplates their payment in money.

For the reasons above given, and also because it would be unwise in the opinion of your committee to set an example of issuing fifty-year bonds bearing a higher rate of interest than 3.65 per cent., they fixed that rate in the bill; and their opinion remains unchanged. That there may be no misapprehension as to the pledge of the United States we here repeat it in the exact words of the bill: "And the faith of the United States is hereby pledged that the United States will, by proper proportional appropriations as contemplated in this act, and by causing to be levied upon the property within said District such taxes as will provide the revenues necessary to pay the interest on said bonds as the same may become due and payable, and create a sinking fund for the payment of the principal thereof at maturity."

Your committee ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the message.

WILLIAM B. ALLISON.
A. G. THURMAN.
WILLIAM M. STEWART.
J. M. WILSON.
LYMAN K. BASS.
ROBERT HAMILTON.
JAY A. HUBBELL.
HUGH J. JEWETT.

Mr. ALLISON. I will only add to the report that the committee have the best reasons for stating that the President, after being made familiar with all the facts and circumstances, is satisfied with the provision in the bill.

Mr. SARGENT. That is an extraordinary statement to accompany the report. I think it is rather an improper statement to make on the floor of the Senate. I call the Senator to order.

Mr. THURMAN. It is not out of order, I submit to my friend from California. It is out of order to allude to the opinions of the House of Representatives or of the President to influence legislation; but here was a message of the President in respect to a particular feature in the bill——

Mr. SARGENT. Allow me, with all due respect to the Senator from Ohio himself and to the Senator from Iowa, to suggest that I understood the Senator from Iowa to state that he thought the President was now satisfied that this bill was right, notwithstanding this afternoon he sent in his veto. I thought that was an extraordinary statement and one that must have been intended to influence the votes of Senators.

Mr. THURMAN. There is no vote of the Senate to be taken nor any veto of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The message of the President did not return the bill.

Mr. THURMAN. Therefore there was nothing improper in what the Senator from Iowa said.

Mr. SARGENT. Then I withdraw the remark. I misunderstood the case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks the remark was not out of order. There is no vote to be taken on the subject.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3415) to provide for the care and custody of persons convicted in the courts of the United States who have or may become insane while imprisoned, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. C. D. MACDOUGALL of New York, Mr. JOHN B. RICE of Illinois, and Mr. R. MILTON SPEER of Pennsylvania, managers at the same on its part.

The message further announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 899) to constitute Montgomery, in the State of Alabama, a port of delivery, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. OMAR D. CONGER of Michigan, Mr. FREDERICK G. BROMBERG of Alabama, and Mr. JAMES T. RAPIER of Alabama, managers at the same on its part.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (H. R. No. 3772) for the relief of John D. Young, of Kentucky; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had appointed Mr. CHARLES O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, a manager at the second conference on the part of the House in place of Mr. HENRY A. STARKWEATHER, of Connecticut, excused, upon the bill (H. R. No. 2342) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3600) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes.

Mr. PRATT. I do not wish to wrestle with the decision of the Chair if the Chair has examined the clause of the bill to which my amendment relates. I will read it:

To indemnify the States for expenses incurred by them in enrolling, equipping, and transporting troops for the defense of the United States during the late insurrection, $250,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to ask the Senator if he appeals from the decision of the Chair? I merely do it in the interest of getting on. I should be very glad to hear the Senator, but I want to know where we are.

Mr. PRATT. I wish to know what the decision of the Chair is after I have called the attention of the Chair to the appropriation to which my amendment relates. I think the Senator from Vermont will not object. Here, then, is an appropriation of $250,000 for the purpose of indemnifying the States for expenses incurred in enrolling, equipping, and transporting troops for the defense of the United States. Now there is a statute in force, passed about a year since, that the accounting officers of the Treasury construe to amount to a positive bar against the States prosecuting claims against the General Government after the 30th day of this present month. This amendment recites the law. It was a part of the legislative appropriation bill a year ago. It reads as follows:

That no claims against the United States for collecting, drilling, or organizing volunteers for the war of the rebellion shall be audited or paid unless presented before the end of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874.

The accounting officers of the Treasury are disposed to construe that as including the States who hold such claims as these against the General Government. Now, you perceive that if this law be susceptible of such a construction, the appropriation which I have just recited here is vain, because upon the 30th of June this bar immediately takes effect prohibiting the accounting officers of the Treasury from examining these claims. Therefore it does seem to me that this amendment is in aid of this appropriation. It seeks to remove a bar to this appropriation being carried out. I respectfully submit these reasons to the Chair why its decision should not stand. I do not wish to prosecute an appeal, of course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has listened to the remarks of the Senator out of respect to his opinion and reconsidered the question, but the Chair is still of opinion that this is clearly a matter of legislation. It does not give any different direction to the $250,000 appropriated, but it repeals an independent provision of a former statute. That must be legislation in the opinion of the Chair, and must be out of order under this very strict rule which requires that the amendment shall "directly relate" to the appropriations in the bill.

Mr. PRATT. I should hope there might be unanimous consent that this amendment might be ingrafted on the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I would agree to give unanimous consent but that I think the appropriation ought to be struck out altogether. Here we are, ten years after the war has ended, providing for paying States for equipping and drilling troops.

Mr. MITCHELL. I arise to a point of order that there is nothing before the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The bill is before the Senate. I have not the least objection to the Senator from Oregon offering an amendment as I see he desires to do; but I do not propose to be taken off my feet on a point of order when we have the bill up. Now I take my seat.

Mr. PRATT. I believe the statute of limitations did not run against a New England State though the claim originated in 1812.

Mr. MITCHELL. I offer the following amendment which I am authorized to offer by two committees, the Committee on Appropriations and the Committee on Military Affairs. On page 25, after line 598, insert:

For this amount, or so much thereof as may be required to meet certain indebtedness on account of the Indian service at the Malheur reservation, in Oregon, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, $16,145.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear that explained, reserving the point of order upon it.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will state for the benefit of the Senator from Vermont that at the time the deficiency bill was under consideration, in consequence of a mistake in the Interior Department no estimate for this had come in, though the reservation had been set apart. After that the mistake was discovered, and the Secretary of the Interior sent letters to the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs stating the fact of the deficiency and also the reasons why it was not included in the deficiency estimates and urging upon the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs that it be inserted in this bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Who wrote the letter?

Mr. MITCHELL. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs, indorsed by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is this "certain indebtedness" mentioned in the amendment? What is it for? Whom is it owing to?

Mr. MITCHELL. It is owing to different parties. These debts were incurred by the agent at the Malheur reservation; they are of the same character as other deficiencies that were included in the deficiency bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is to provide for the payment of private claims. The Senator says here are various people who have debts against this agency; therefore the amendment is evidently not in order. We ought not to consider it now.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is not a private claim, as I understand, by any law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator has stated frankly—and as he is a gentleman he would of course be frank—that here are certain debts incurred by an Indian agent to private persons for this, that, and the other, and he wants to have those debts paid.

Mr. MITCHELL. This simply provides that this amount shall be appropriated and placed at the disposal of that agent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly; "to pay certain indebtedness."

Mr. MITCHELL. That is it exactly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is "to provide," in the very language of the rule, "for the payment of a private claim." Now let me hear the letter.

Mr. MITCHELL. The letter is in possession of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Then the chairman of the committee can attend to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is clearly out of order, in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. MITCHELL. I now offer the following amendment:

For the necessary expenses of the land office at the Dalles, Oregon: For salaries and commissions of the register and the receiver for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, $6,000; and for incidental expenses of said officers, $1,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Where is the estimate for that?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think that is allowable. It is to provide for an office created by law at this session.

Mr. EDMUNDS. All right.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. I offer another amendment, to come in on page 46, after line 1122:

For the construction of a range-light on Sand Island, at the mouth of Columbia River, Oregon, $25,000.

For a fog-signal on Sand Island, at the mouth of Columbia River, $10,000.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not know what to say about that.

Mr. MITCHELL. I hold in my hand a letter from the chairman of the Light-House Board.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I want to hear it explained.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment. Those in favor——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not intend that this amendment shall be adopted without our understanding it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has no alternative but to put the question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And the Senator from Vermont has no alternative but to get up and address the Chair. Now I ask the Senator from Oregon, because I am interested, as representing certain taxpayers, in this question as well as the Senator in charge of this bill, to tell us where his authority is for this amendment, what committee has reported it, what reference has been made of it to the Committee on Appropriations, what their judgment is upon it, and what estimate of the head of a Department, according to the rule, is the authority for this proposition.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will state that this improvement was petitioned for very largely by all the mariners along the line of this river. The petition was sent to the Secretary of the Treasury with a letter written by myself asking a recommendation from the Light-House Board. The letter and petition were referred to the Light-House Board. At the same time or about the same time I presented this amendment to be offered to this bill, and it was referred to the Committee on Appropriations. I understood that I was authorized by that committee to offer the amendment. I have a letter in my desk from the chairman of the Light-House Board strongly recommending the appropriation.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I understand the Senator has sent a proposed amendment to the Committee on Appropriations. He gave us notice of his intention to offer his amendment on this bill. Here [exhibiting a bundle of papers] is a large package of such amendments, amounting to one hundred perhaps in all. The course the committee are obliged to take on these questions I may state—and that will explain to the Senator the action of the committee in this particular—is this: where amendments are accompanied with such papers as enable the committee to form a judgment, we pass upon them; where they are not, we leave those who submit them to make out their case in the Senate. The Senator has got the documents on which he relies. He is at liberty to move his amendment here and support it as he can from the documents he has.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It seems to me that the Senator from Oregon has done all that he could be required to do in this case. He has the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear it read.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Let the letter be sent to the Chair and read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I want to hear the authority read, because I intend that the Secretary of the Treasury shall be responsible for this appropriation if it is made. It may be perfectly right, and I am sure the Senator from Oregon will not misunderstand me when I wish to know that the executive department of the Government is responsible for this being put into the bill. When I ascertain that, then it may make a difference with my opinion upon the subject. If the Senator will be kind enough to send the estimate of the head of the Department recommending this appropriation to the desk that it may be read to us, then we shall know that the Department is responsible.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have here all the correspondence, and I send it to the desk to be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The papers will be read if there be no objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

UNITED STATES SENATE CHAMBER,
Washington, June 8, 1874.

DEAR SIR: I desire to call your special attention to a matter connected with the commerce of the Columbia River, Oregon, with a view of procuring from you a recommendation for an appropriation at the present session of Congress for the construction of a range-light and fog-signal on Sand Island near the mouth of the Columbia.

It is a fact which of course has not escaped the attention of your department, that the commerce of the Columbia River has within the past few years increased with a rapidity that has been both wonderful and gratifying.

The great agricultural productions of Oregon, especially wheat, have attracted European ships to the ports of Portland and Astoria in scores. Nearly three hundred vessels entered the mouth of the Columbia from the ocean last year. As this commerce has gradually increased and as delays and disasters multiply, the necessary facilities for the protection of that commerce became apparent.

Having a personal acquaintance with most of the sea-faring men engaged in that trade, I have during the past year endeavored to inform myself as to their opinions as to any further aids necessary, and I find that but one opinion exists both among those engaged in navigating these waters and citizens who have for years resided near the Columbia in Oregon and Washington Territory, and that is that among the improvements imperatively demanded is a range-light and fog-signal on Sand Island, and it is asserted confidently that by reason solely of the absence of these aids steamships from San Francisco are frequently delayed at sea from twelve to fifteen hours.

Inclosed I transmit a petition signed by all the leading citizens of Astoria and vicinity, including the collector of the port, praying an appropriation for this purpose. I therefore respectfully urge that a recommendation from your department may be given in favor of an appropriation at the present session of Congress for the construction of a suitable range-light and fog-signal at the port above designated. Should you make the recommendation, please state the amount necessary for such purpose. And as the appropriation bill will soon come up for consideration in the Senate, I will be gratified with an early reply.

Respectfully,

J. H. MITCHELL.

Gen. A. A. HUMPHREYS,
Chief of Engineers, United States Army.

Mr. WEST. With all due respect to the Senator from Oregon, we want a communication from the authoritative head of a Department and not from the Senator.

Mr. MITCHELL. I desire to have the whole correspondence read as it was called for, so that the matter may be understood.

The Secretary read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE LIGHT-HOUSE BOARD,
Washington, June, 20, 1874.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit a petition of certain citizens for a light on Sand Island, Oregon, which has been forwarded to the board by Hon. J. H. MITCHELL, United States Senator, and to request that you, as chairman of the committee on lighting, will report upon it as early as possible, that Mr. MITCHELL may be notified without delay.

It was intended to bring this matter up before the board at its session on the 17th instant, but time did not permit.

The inclosures are as follows, and their return is respectfully asked:

1. Letter of Hon. J. H. MITCHELL, United States Senator, dated June 8, 1874, transmitting
2. Petition.

Very respectfully,

PETER C. HAINES,
Engineer Secretary.

C. P. PATTERSON, Esq.,
Chairman Committee on Lighting.

OFFICE OF LIGHT-HOUSE BOARD,
Washington, June 20, 1874.

SIR: The committee on lighting, to whom was referred the letter of Hon. J. H. MITCHELL, United States Senator, and petition of a number of citizens of Oregon for a range-light and fog-signal on Sand Island, at the entrance of the Columbia River, beg leave to report that they have carefully considered the matter and urgently recommend that an application may be made to Congress for the necessary appropriation for the erection of these safeguards to the great and constantly increasing commerce of the Columbia River. The amount required for the range-light is $20,000, and for the fog steam-signal $10,000, making a total of $30,000.

Very respectfully,

C. P. PATTERSON,
Chairman Committee on Lighting.

Professor JOSEPH HENRY,
Chairman Light-House Board, Washington.

Mr. WEST. There is no measure that I would be more inclined to assist than anything that would promote the safety and security of the transit of the bar of the Columbia River, having some knowledge of the difficulties there; but the Senate is now about to depart from a rule that shuts out in a great many instances other appropriations, and has in the consideration of this bill before the committee excluded various recommendations; and that is the rule that a recommendation to be entertained either by the Senate or by its committee must receive the indorsement of the chief of the Department.

Mr. EDMUNDS. "Head" is the language of the rule.

Mr. WEST. This recommendation does not come from the Treasury Department, supervising the Light-House Board, nor does it come from the Secretary of War, controlling the Engineer Corps. It is not in order. I do not specifically object to this, but I will state to the Senator and to the Senate that amendments which I have proposed have been rejected on that ground, and in order to be consistent the Senate cannot entertain this.

Mr. GORDON. I offer an amendment.

Mr. MITCHELL. What disposition has been made of my amendment?

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Louisiana raises the question of order that it does not fall within the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The Chair understands that the letter which has been read is not from the head of a Department nor transmitted through the head of a Department. The Chair therefore thinks the amendment is not in order.

Mr. GORDON. I offer the following amendment to come in on page 66, after line 615:

That the act entitled "An act for the erection of a public building for the use of the United States in Atlanta, Georgia," approved February 12, 1873, be, and the same is hereby, amended so that the sum of money authorized to be expended in the construction of said building is fixed at the sum of $250,000.

The matter has been referred informally to the committee. I had not time to refer it regularly, because a bill for this purpose was only passed yesterday by the House on the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury. Everybody understands it I believe.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I offer the following amendment:

For payment for subsistence of the Arickarees, Gros Ventres, and Mandans, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, $48,193.76, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is that? What committee reported it?

Mr. ALLISON. Is there anything in the names that is remarkable?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I make the point of order that the amendment does not come within any one of the phrases allowed by the rule. It is not reported from a committee, so far as we know. It has not been referred to the Committee on Appropriations, so far as we know. It is not to carry out the provisions of any existing law, so far as we know. It is not recommended by the head of any Department, as far as we know. These are a few of the first points of order that I have to make. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator from Vermont will allow me one moment, I will state, in the first place, that it has not been recommended by any head of a Department nor has it been reported from any committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks it is out of order.

Mr. ALLISON. Nevertheless it is an expenditure that has been honestly and fairly incurred, and it ought to be paid. I have several documents showing that fact. I desire to present it. Gentlemen may laugh these matters down, but I desire to present it in the interest of two constituents of mine who have expended this money.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then it is a private claim in addition. That is another point of order, for which I am obliged to the Senator.

Mr. ALLISON. Having discharged my duty in that regard, the amendment being ruled out of order, I have nothing more to say.

Mr. FLANAGAN. On page 51, at the end of line 1250, I move to insert the following:

That the sum of $100,000 for the construction of depot buildings, including shops, offices, and commissary and quartermaster's store-rooms at San Antonia, Texas, appropriated by an act approved March 3, 1873, be, and the same is hereby, continued and made available for the fiscal year 1875.

I suppose there is no objection to that.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I should like to hear some explanation of it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to reserve all points of order.

Mr. ALLISON. I must also reserve all points of order on every amendment now.

Mr. FLANAGAN. I have here as a basis the law passed March 3, 1873, making this appropriation in accordance with the recommendation of the chief quartermaster located at San Antonio and with the indorsement of General Sherman upon it, on which this act was enacted. The money has not up to this time been used, and we ought to have the privilege of using it the present year. The amendment was regularly presented to the Committee on Appropriations, and it is to carry out the law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks the amendment is not in order. It does not seem to be recommended by the head of any Department.

Mr. FLANAGAN. I was told there would be no objection if it was recommended by General Sherman, and it is the law now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. FLANAGAN. I was told there would be no objection to it by one of the committee. I could not make them report. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is out of order.

Mr. CLAYTON. I offer the following amendment, to insert at the end of that part of the bill relating to the War Department, on page 53:

That the Secretary of War shall grant trade permits at any military post to any person applying for the same who shall give bond in the sum of $500,000 that he will comply with the rules and regulations of the War Department governing traderships; and the sum of twenty-five dollars for blanks, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated to carry this provision into effect.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is new legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is out of order, in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. SCOTT. I am authorized by the Committee on Finance to propose the following amendment, of which due notice was given and which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

That hereafter the compensation of the Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury, the Solicitor of the Treasury, and the Commissioner of Customs shall be each $4,500 per annum; and a sum sufficient to pay the amount of increase in these salaries is hereby appropriated.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I reserve all points of order on that amendment.

Mr. SCOTT. No point of order has been made. Two of the offices named in the amendment are now vacant. The new Secretary of the Treasury is very anxious that he shall be able to offer such compensation as will secure to him, if not the best, very good services in both those offices, the Solicitor of the Treasury and the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury. As to the Commissioner of Customs, since the new Secretary of the Treasury has assumed his office he has transferred to the head of that Bureau what was perhaps almost a Bureau itself, the special agency service of the Department.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It always belonged to that Bureau.

Mr. SCOTT. The head of that special agency service received $3,500 a year himself, while the Commissioner of Customs received $3,000 salary. It is now proposed to raise his salary to $4,500. I may state without any impropriety that it is very much desired by the Secretary of the Treasury that this amendment should prevail.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. I have not charge of this bill, but I merely rise in order to keep myself informed of the state of legislation. I wish to inquire of the Chair whether, if I will reserve all points of order on this amendment, it will be open to a point of order when the bill gets into the Senate, or whether the point of order would be foreclosed? We are now in Committee of the Whole. If this amendment be adopted subject to the points of order, if I can reserve them so that I can insist upon them when we come into the Senate if I choose, I shall not object.

If not, I insist on their being decided now. If the Chair holds that if this amendment be adopted in committee no point of order can be made upon it in the Senate, I wish to understand it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks the point of order must be raised now, if at all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I make the point of order. My point of order is that this is new legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SHERMAN. I believe myself that if the point of order is insisted on, this being new legislation, a change of the existing law fixing the salaries of these officers, the amendment must be ruled out under the rule; but I submit to the discretion of the Senator from Vermont, and all Senators, whether under the circumstances, as a new Secretary has come into the Department, finding two offices vacant, we——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not want to interrupt the Senator, but unless he appeals, I want to get on with this bill and get it out of committee. The Senator can offer the amendment in the Senate just as well, and then we can consider how it is going to operate, and go on with the bill now.

Mr. SHERMAN. I must confess that the point of order is well taken if it be insisted upon.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know that I shall insist upon it when we get into the Senate, but in order to have time for consideration I must insist upon it now. I merely want to think of it for a little.

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall not object to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is ruled out.

Mr. SCOTT. I now offer the following amendment, of which I gave notice and had it referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

To pay the Alleghany Valley Railroad Company the balance due them for transportation of the mails for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, $7,232.75.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have that explained.

Mr. SCOTT. I will send to the Chair and have read a letter from the Department, which shows that this balance was due to the company upon their stated account, that they did not call for it, and under the act of 1870 it was covered into the Treasury.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The letter will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE AUDITOR OF THE TREASURY
FOR THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., May 18, 1874.

SIR: In reply to yours of the 15th instant, I have to state that there is due the Alleghany Railroad Company, on account of service performed in 1868 and 1869, the sum of $7,232.75. This amount cannot be paid until an appropriation is made by Congress under the provisions of the act of July 12, 1870.

Respectfully, yours,

J. J. MARTIN, Auditor.

Hon. JOHN SCOTT, United States Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I make the point of order that this is to provide for a private claim.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is well taken in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. SCOTT. Allow me to state to the Chair what the nature of the claim is. A contract was made in pursuance of law by the Postmaster-General for carrying the mails upon this railroad. I have in my hand the account stated with the company, showing that this balance was due, if called for, but it was not called for at that time; and I do not see by what other process the money is to be had but by an appropriation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Neither do I; but I understand that when other citizens have claims on the Government of the United States they file their petition, or some representative of theirs brings in a bill, which goes to the committee of which my honorable friend is the chairman, and they consider the justice of that claim and report upon it by bill. Now this claim may be perfectly just; I have no reason to doubt it; I know nothing about it; but we have stood upon the ground that these appropriation bills were to carry out the provisions of law for carrying on the Government, and the rules have provided expressly that private claims should not be put upon them. I am sorry to say that this bill, in spite of all that can have been done, was pretty well loaded as it came from the House of Representatives with private claims already; but I do not think the Senate ought to follow the evil example of loading up a miscellaneous appropriation bill as you would load up an omnibus by providing for every person who has a private claim when you do not get the distinct report of a committee upon it by itself, instead of putting it into a condition where everybody is tempted to log-roll a bill through because his particular constituent has got an interest in it. That mischief the rule was intended to defeat and provide against; and I submit to my honorable friend whether it is right to press amendments of this character upon an appropriation bill? I of course have no hostility to this company; the Senator knows that; but I submit to him, as the chief of our Committee on Claims and as a member of the Committee on Finance, whether it is not best to stand by the rule and keep this bill as free as we can, because perhaps we cannot control the House of Representatives on matters of this character. I say this without expressing the slightest opinion adverse to the claim of this particular company.

Mr. SCOTT. I agree to the force of all the Senator from Vermont states in reference to what are strictly private claims which come here unestablished by the ordinary evidence from the Departments; but I conceived when this was sent to me in this form that it came within the rule, in the first place being for the purpose of carrying out an existing law; in the second place in pursuance of the acknowledgment of the head of a Department that it is due and all that it needs is an appropriation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is not from the head of the Department, the Postmaster-General; nor is the Secretary of the Treasury responsible for this letter. It is the letter of a Bureau officer.

Mr. SCOTT. It is from that officer who has control of the accounts of the Post-Office Department. I do not wish to discuss the point nor appeal from the decision of the Chair, as I do not wish to take up time.

Mr. ALLISON. The Chair has ruled it out of order.

Mr. MERRIMON. I offer the following amendment:

For paying the sum of $8,596.98 to the Wilmington and Manchester Railroad Company for mail service rendered previous to the late war.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I make the point of order that that is a private claim.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. MERRIMON. I call attention——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. MERRIMON. I do not; but I wish to call the attention of the Chair to the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will listen to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. MERRIMON. The last clause of the thirtieth rule is in these words:

And no amendment shall be received whose object is to provide for a private claim unless it be to carry out the provisions of an existing law or a treaty stipulation.

There was an existing law at the time this service was rendered, a general law authorizing contracts to be made and the service to be rendered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That has been ruled so many times, that the "existing law" understood by this rule as one which declares that a particular person is entitled to have a particular sum paid to him, that I need not spend time to counteract that proposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. MERRIMON. Does the Chair rule against the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes, sir.

Mr. FLANAGAN. I offer the following amendment, to come in on page 18, after line 416:

The Secretary of the Senate is hereby authorized to pay to the page of the Vice-President three dollars per day.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How much is paid to the other pages?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. They were formerly paid three dollars a day; they are paid $2.50 now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why pay this page three dollars?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Mr. President——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I leave it to the chairman of the committee to say whether he will make the distinction.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I believe the reason submitted to the committee was this: He is the page of the Vice-President; the Vice-President does not hold a session, and we do. He is therefore, I suppose, regarded as being in continuing service, while the young gentlemen who wait upon us here do it while we are in session and then disappear. That, I suppose, is the whole argument. It is submitted to the judgment of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That will not do.

Mr. CONOVER. Is he not also a page of the Senate?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SPRAGUE. By the request of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] I offer the following amendment, to come in on page 66, after line 1626:

For furniture, books, and paper-cases, gas-fixtures, carpets, and mats for the United States court-room and clerk's office, Wilmington, Delaware, $2,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I make the point of order that that amendment has not been reported from any committee and it has not been referred to the Committee on Appropriations and it is not in pursuance of an estimate of any head of Department.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not know how that is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I withdraw the amendment.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senate concur in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I reserve them all.

Mr. BOGY. There is one amendment which is reserved particularly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont reserves all the amendments.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I want to see what they are. We have not tried this bill yet. It is full of improper items, and I say it with some sorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question will be taken on the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole separately. The first amendment will be read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no objection to the first amendment on the second page, so far as I see. I do not know whether Senators have, but we have gone so fast with this bill that I have not been able to keep the run of it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senator has not been here all the time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; but the Senator will excuse me if I have not; I have been performing other duties, and I think the Senator will admit that I have given my devoted assistance to his brilliant lead in support of this bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senator has been very useful; but his criticism about this bill being full of improper things is a little gratuitous.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not charge anything for it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first amendment made as in Committee of the Whole will be considered as concurred in. The second amendment will be reported.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be considered as concurred in. The next amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The next amendment is on page 4, line 70.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no objection to that myself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be considered as concurred in. The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The next amendment is on page 5, after line 108, to insert:

For the following clerks in the office of the Comptroller of the Currency: two clerks of class three, two clerks of class one, nine female clerks, and for extra compensation to four heads of divisions, $2,400—$16,100.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is that an increase of the existing force, may I ask?

Mr. SHERMAN. That is an amendment I offered. It is required by the currency act approved by the President.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The new bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no objection.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was on page 6, to insert the following clause from line 113 to 124:

For the purchase of an engine and machinery, and for the erection and expenses incident to its operation, for the maceration of national-bank notes, United States notes, and other obligations of the United States authorized to be destroyed, $10,000; and that all such issues hereafter destroyed may be destroyed by maceration instead of burning to ashes, as now provided by law; and that so much of sections 24 and 43 of the national-currency act as requires national-bank notes to be burned to ashes is hereby repealed; that the pulp from such macerated issue shall be disposed of only under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no objection.

The amendment was concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole is on page 9, line 188, to reduce the appropriation "for continuing the collection of statistics of mines and mining" from $15,000 to $10,000.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was in line 206, after the name "F. V. Hayden," to insert "to continue the work westward toward the Green and Colorado Rivers, $75,000;" and after the name "J. W. Powell," in line 208, to insert "in Utah, $15,000," and at the end of the clause to insert the words "in all" before "ninety;" so as to make the clause read:

For the continuation of the geological and geographical surveys of the Territories of the United States by F. V. Hayden, to continue the work westward toward the Green and Colorado Rivers, $75,000; and J. W. Powell, in Utah, $15,000, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, in all $90,000.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was on page 11, after line 249, to insert:

That the salary of the special policeman in the office of the Secretary of the Senate shall hereafter be $1,296; and a sum sufficient to pay the same is hereby appropriated.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the salary of the other policemen?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Over $1,400.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why is this distinction made?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. He has a special duty confined to the Secretary's office.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is this an additional officer?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. O, no.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was in line 254, page 11, to strike out the words:

And for amount already expended by the Sergeant-at-Arms for postage-stamps, $250.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was after line 303, to insert:

For the erection of an equestrian statue to Nathanael Greene, in conformity with a resolution of Congress passed August 8, 1786, $40,000; and one member of each House of Congress, to be appointed by the presiding officer of each House respectively, and George Washington Greene, of Rhode Island, be, and they are thereby, appointed a commission to contract for the same.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was after line 311 to insert:

To enable the Joint Committee on the Library to purchase such works of art for ornamenting the Capitol as may be ordered and approved, $10,000.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was after line 314 to insert:

To enable the Librarian of Congress to employ two assistants, in connection with the work of the copyright department, and in preparing a complete index of subjects to the documents and debates of Congress, at $1,600 each, $3,200. And the Librarian is hereby charged with the work of preparing such an index, under the supervision of the Joint Committee on the Library; and he is hereby authorized and required to complete the two sets of congressional documents required by existing laws to be deposited in the Library of Congress, and which were partially destroyed by fire; and to this end he may make requisition upon the Secretary of the Interior, in charge of the reserve of public documents; and such volumes as cannot be supplied by the Interior Department may be transferred to the Library of Congress from the documents in charge of the Secretary of the Senate and of the Clerk of the House of Representatives, the Librarian of Congress giving a receipt therefor.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was after line 332 to insert:

For necessary repairs of the telegraph line connecting the Capitol and the Executive Departments, $1,000.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was after line 335 to insert:

To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to pay D. L. Phillips, late United States marshal of Illinois, for counsel fees and expenses incurred in executing the habeas corpus act, the accounts of which have been passed by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, $476.53.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have the chairman of the committee tell us something about that. We have investigated various claims of a similar character in the Committee on the Judiciary, who ought to investigate these questions, and have reported to the Senate very stringently upon them, and have always been sustained. Very likely the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations can tell us what there is about this particular law-officer of the Government which entitles him to be paid for counsel fees that he has expended. I think it my duty to ask for an explanation.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The explanation is what is substantially stated in the text of the amendment. This man had charges for the service mentioned, which were audited by the accounting officers of the Treasury; and this is for the balance of the account thus stated.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This is very extraordinary. We have provided for the Department of Justice appropriations regularly every year and have provided for all the deficiencies that have been asked for. Now there is something about this claim which does not authorize it to be paid either out of the regular appropriations or the deficiencies which we ought to understand. It may be perfectly just; but I submit to the Senate that it is not right to other people similarly situated or right to the public interests to pass private claims of this character unless we understand precisely the ground on which we are going; and thus it is that I take the liberty to ask my friend from Maine to show us the papers on the subject, if he has any; and if he has not, I hope the Senate will disagree to the amendment, because it has no place in a bill of this character. It ought to have been introduced as a separate bill, because it does not fall under the ordinary expenditures. If it did it would not be here at all; and it should have been sent to the proper committee to investigate upon its individual merits, having the means, which the Committee on Appropriations have not in the great pressure upon their time, to make a special investigation into the particular subject.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. There are papers here somewhere which explain the whole thing.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That may be; but I should like to know what they are.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I understand the curiosity of my honorable friend.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope certainly the Senator from Maine is not offended at my wishing to know how this stands.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No; I am not in the slightest.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be struck out until we can see into it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No; I do not propose to let it be struck out. I send the papers to the desk to be read.

The Secretary read the following letters:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, FIRST AUDITOR'S OFFICE,
Washington, July 17, 1873.

SIR: Your accounts for expenses incurred in executing the habeas corpus act have been referred to this office by the War Department for examination and settlement, payment to be made from the appropriation provided by the ninth section of "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government," approved March 3, 1863. I find upon inquiry that the unexpended balance of this appropriation has been carried to the surplus fund, and is therefore not applicable for any purpose. I am not aware of any existing appropriation under the control of the Treasury Department from which your claims can be paid.

Respectfully,

H. K. LEAVER,
Acting Auditor.

D. L. PHILLIPS, Esq.,
Springfield, Illinois.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., June 28, 1873.

SIR: Referring to your letter of the 4th instant, submitting your account, amounting to $463.63, for counsel fees and expenses incurred in four suits instituted against you as United States marshal of Illinois, and inclosing in support thereof transcripts of the cases as they appear on the docket, together with the certificate of the Hons. O. H. Browning and John M. Palmer that the charges are reasonable and proper, I am directed by the Secretary of War to inform you that he has approved the accounts for payment, and that the papers in the case have this day been transmitted to the accounting officers of the Treasury for settlement.

The letter of the Attorney-General, dated July 22, 1863, and the order of the Secretary of War, dated July 26, 1862, are herewith returned, as requested. Copies sent with papers to the accounting officers forthwith.

Very respectfully,

W. M. DUNN,
Assistant Judge Advocate-General.

D. L. PHILLIPS, Esq.,
Springfield, Illinois.

Mr. OGLESBY. In regard to this claim I have a word to say. Colonel Phillips was marshal of the State of Illinois and he was ordered at different times and under various circumstances to different portions of the State to arrest those persons who were supposed to be treacherous to the Union, who were under suspicion in various counties of the State. He was ordered to go at once for their arrest. He went, and paid, generally, his own expenses. He had not time to wait. He went into Edgar County, and into Williamson County, and different counties in the State from eighty to one hundred and fifty miles from Springfield. His claim is for the expenses by him incurred in arresting that class of men who were sent here and kept in the Capitol prison under suspicion of infidelity and treason to the Government. He has waited year in and year out until the amount allowed him will scarcely pay his expenses for coming here.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is very extraordinary that ten years have gone over without any bill being introduced and passed to pay this gentleman if he is rightly entitled to it. He may be rightly entitled to it. The papers that we have here do not show that he is. They show the opinion of the Secretary of War ten years after, that he may be rightly entitled. I do not mean to say that he is not, because I do not know. I only mean to say that other persons who have had similar claims have been obliged to have them sent to the proper committee for an investigation upon their own merits, and have not been allowed to ride them upon an appropriation bill. Therefore I feel it to be a matter of duty and a matter of justice to insist upon it that this appropriation should not be made for this private claim in this bill, and that without any prejudice to the right of this gentleman to present his petition in the proper way and have it properly investigated by the proper committee and reported upon. It seems to me that it is not the right thing to put in a claim that is at least ten years old in an appropriation bill to pay a private citizen for a matter that has so long gone by when we are reporting daily with the approval of the Senate, either pro or con, on special investigation, the claims of other citizens of like character growing out of their execution of judicial or other duties under the judicial department of the Government. Therefore I make the point of order that this amendment is to provide for the payment of a private claim, and the Committee on Appropriations has no more right to report it than I have or any other person.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks it is too late to raise the point of order after the amendment has been passed upon in the Committee of the Whole and reported to the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I hope the Senate will disagree to the amendment, and that without prejudice to the right of this gentleman to have his cause heard as other gentlemen have theirs. I think it is right to the Senate and to justice that we should do that thing.

Mr. OGLESBY. If Colonel Phillips shall be turned loose now to browse upon hopeless prospects about the claim any longer it is a heartless and sickening future for him. He paid but little attention to it, tried to get along without it, and finally believing the claim was justly due him from the Government he presented it. Governor Palmer, of the State of Illinois, certifies to it, and so far as the services are concerned fifty witnesses could be brought to establish the facts. It may be true, as the honorable Senator from Vermont says, that the case ought to have come up here through some committee on claims, and I am not prepared to dispute the justice of that proposition; but it has been lingering and dallying and hanging along until the man is heartsick, and I can say for him that if he does not get it now he will give it up forever. A man who did the service that he did I think will abandon it entirely rather than be pressing it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is precisely what we do not know.

Mr. OGLESBY. It is a just claim. I am not particularly interested about him; he has not even consulted me about it; he was here this winter, staid two or three days, and bothered me very little about it. He has been disappointed and put off about it so many times that he has a hopeless sort of chance if you do not pay him now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why has he been put off?

Mr. OGLESBY. He has been expecting to get it through the judicial department of the Government. It has been postponed and shuffled around, and finally he comes here and gets the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations and of the proper Department of Government, and they put it on this multifarious sundry civil service bill that covers all creation and takes in everything. I looked at it to-day until it made my head swim. But it turns out a little $430 claim, and that from the interior of Illinois, is not legitimate or constitutional in this bill that takes in all God's creation except Illinois.

The amendment was concurred in; there being on a division—ayes 27, noes 12.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to state now that I withdraw all points of order that I have made against any amendment to this bill in committee, and shall not insist upon any of them against any Senator who chooses to propose anything, because I will not myself be the instrument of granting favors to one person that are to be denied to another, by loading a bill of this kind with private claims which we know nothing about.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I hope then that Senators who desire to reserve particular amendments will do so, and that we shall pass upon the others together.

Mr. EDMUNDS, I have not withdrawn my reservation. The Senate will take its own responsibility and vote upon each one of these amendments; but I think it just and honest to say to the Senators against whom I have been making points of order, that I shall not stand up to oppose them when the Senate chooses to make an exception of this kind for this particular gentleman. The Senator from Maine of course can exercise his own judgment in asserting his own rights, but the responsibility shall not rest upon my shoulders.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not understand the lecture which the Senator gives to the Senate or the committee. I do not know which he intends it for. If he intends to lecture me on the subject, I consider it entirely gratuitous.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly. I charge nothing for it. The Senator gets it free.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. So far as I am concerned, it is not worth a great deal. I have endeavored to do my duty on this bill faithfully. I do not intend to present any claim to the Senate of the United States that I am not willing to stand by; and I do not intend to be lectured constantly without exhibiting a sufficient degree of resentment. That is all I have to say about that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator has got his umbrella very wide open for a shower, as it seems to me. I have said nothing about the Senator from Maine except that I renounced in his favor all responsibility. If the Senator considers that a lecture, he is entitled to his opinion no doubt. I thought I had the right (and if I am wrong the Senator from Maine will correct me) to withdraw all objections that I had made to the amendments proposed by the Senator from Oregon and other Senators on points of order, that they were private claims, &c. If I had not that right, without the Senator from Maine jumping out of his seat and considering himself lectured, then he will be good enough to tell us so. The Senator from Maine perfectly well understands how much I regard him and his fidelity, and he must have got somewhat wearied with the great package of good things he has before him to suppose that when I abdicate in his favor I am lecturing him. I shall not do anything of the kind. Now, I hope the Senator from Maine is satisfied.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes, sir; I am entirely satisfied, but I have nothing to take back, that the Senator means me when he says that he makes opposition to the proposition here, and then turns away from it in disgust and shakes off the dust from his feet upon all this class of cases, and turns around to the Senator from Maine and says, "He can take his own course." If it has any reference to me at all it means that I am connected with these claims in a way he does not countenance, and he wishes to direct the attention of the Senate to that fact.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there any objection to the statement of that fact?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not think it is exactly the thing myself. The Senator may very likely think it is a very nice thing to put a man in a very comfortable position. I have done the best I could on these bills. It is not a labor I seek; it is not one of love, rather one of duty; it is irksome and troublesome; and I do not like to be criticised offensively in that way.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not mean to offend the Senator—far from it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I understand. I take no exceptions except that I take occasion to make that remark.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am satisfied with that. Go ahead.

Mr. SARGENT. Let us have the next amendment reported.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was after line 341 to insert the following:

For salary of stenographer to the Secretary of the Treasury, $2,400.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was after line 343 to insert:

That of the unexpended balance of the appropriation made for the office of the Treasurer of the United States for the fiscal year ending with June 30, 1874, $20,000, or so much thereof as may be required, for the payment of salaries of clerks, messengers, and laborers to do the necessary work of that office, may be used for the purpose aforesaid, in the fiscal year ending with June 30, 1875: Provided, That no part of this amount shall be expended for payment of additional compensation to clerks or employés.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was after line 354 to insert:

To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to collect, procure, preserve, and arrange for use all vouchers, papers, records, and evidence, and to take testimony as to claims against the United States, to be paid only upon the certificate of the commissioners of claims, the sum of $20,000 of the unexpended balance of the appropriation made by act of March 3, 1873, is hereby reappropriated.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was after line 362 to insert:

To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the proprietors of the New York Tribune for advertising in said journal, the sum of $839.10, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be paid upon the audit of the proper accounting officers of the Treasury.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is like the Phillips case. It is a private claim, but it is not in order to raise the point now.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will send to the desk the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury in that case if it is desired.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment has been concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was after line 368 to insert:

For payment of the expense of editing the revised statutes, preparing the same for publication, and distributing the same, and for editing the annual statutes, under the direction of the Secretary of State, $20,000, or so much thereof as shall be necessary.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was after line 373 to insert:

To enable the Secretary of the Navy to complete the observations of the transit of Venus, in December, 1874, and to return the parties of observation to the United States, $25,000, to be expended as provided by the act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, approved March 3, 1873.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was after line 381 to insert the following:

For collecting information respecting the condition and importance of the fur trade in the Territory of Alaska, as provided by act of April 22, 1874, $10,000, for the fiscal years 1874 and 1875, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was after line 388 to insert:

For the District of Columbia, the sum of $1,300,000, to be expended by the commissioners of said District, and applied as follows: First, to the payment of interest on the funded debt of said District due July 1, 1874; secondly, to the payment of officers, employés, and laborers of the District, whether of the District proper or of the board of public works; thirdly, to the payment of any indebtedness for which the securities of the District are pledged; and the remainder to the current expenses of said District; all the above sums, except so much thereof as may be paid for interest, as aforesaid, to be considered and adjusted hereafter as a part of the proper proportional sum to be paid by the United States toward the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was to insert after line 401:

For payment of C. H. Evans for services under the direction of the Committee on Ways and Means of the Forty-second Congress, $500.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was after line 401 to insert:

For the payment of M. A. Clancy, for services as stenographer in taking testimony in the matter of the impeachment of Richard Busteed, district judge of the district of Alabama, the sum of $525.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was after line 406 to insert:

For expenses of the Joint Select Committee to Inquire into the Affairs of the District of Columbia, the sum of $6,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was after line 409, to insert:

For this amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to enable the Secretary of the Interior to pay for supplies furnished the Yankton Sioux Indians during the winter of 1866 and 1867, to prevent absolute starvation among said Indians, $11,329.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was to insert after line 416:

The sum of $32,220 is hereby appropriated to defray the expenses of the board of health of the District of Columbia for sanitary purposes for the fiscal year ending July 1, 1875; and the commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, directed to reappropriate the same amount, namely, $32,220, from the funds of the District of Columbia, not otherwise appropriated, for the same purpose.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee, if it will not be offensive to him, and I presume it will not, whether that is intended to make a double appropriation, or whether it is only intended that this sum for the board of health shall be taken out of the fund of the commissioners?

Mr. SARGENT. The whole amount is $64,000 to run the board throughout the year. The purpose is that thirty-two thousand and some hundred dollars shall be expended out of the Treasury of the United States, and the other half out of the District funds, and the authorities of the District are required to make that appropriation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then it is intended to provide for $64,000 instead of $32,000. The language is ambiguous. That is why I made the inquiry.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was to insert after line 416:

That the sum of $1,000 is hereby appropriated for the salary of the Government telegraph operators at the Capitol during the recess of Congress; $500 of the same to be paid by the Secretary of the Senate for the salary of the operator of the Senate, and $500 to be paid by the Clerk of the House of Representatives for the salary of the operator of the House.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the use of having these operators during the recess of the Senate?

Mr. SARGENT. The amount that they receive is $100 a month. It is impossible to get telegraph operators at less than $1,200 a year. This simply runs to December, when some permanent arrangement will be made. That is all it amounts to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have the vote taken upon it.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was after line 471 to insert:

For the purchase for an Indian agency station, the six hundred and forty acres of land situated on Lapwai Creek and Clearwater River, Idaho Territory, heretofore granted to the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, $15,000: Provided, That no part of this sum shall be paid until a perfect title to the said land shall be made to the United States by a warranty deed, to be approved by the Attorney-General.

Mr. EDMUNDS. With due humility, I wish to ask the Committee on Appropriations what this provision means, and how it happens that we have given to this board of commissioners of foreign missions six hundred and forty acres of land and propose to buy it back from them at $15,000?

Mr. SARGENT. I explained that once before in Committee of the Whole, and take great pleasure in replying again. By a law a great many years old there was given to the American Board of Commissioners of Foreign Missions the section of land referred to here, six hundred and forty acres, and there were given to other missionary societies among the Indians pieces of land which they selected. In the progress of time this land passed into the hands of another person. The Government, however, apparently not aware of this title, has put upon this land somewhere from one to two hundred thousand dollars' worth of property in the shape of agency buildings and other improvements in connection with the agency. The title of the individual owner is now set up and is recognized by the local courts, and the alternative of the Government is to abandon the land and lose the large property interest which it has upon the land or to purchase it of the person who has the title. We thought, on the recommendation of the Department, that it was better to buy the title than to lose the property that is upon it.

Mr. INGALLS. Is this the Langford claim?

Mr. EDMUNDS. This is the Langford claim, which we have heard of before, and the Senator from California says that the local courts (by which I suppose he means the territorial courts) have held that the Langford title is a good one.

Mr. SARGENT. They have held that the title to this land is good. I do not recognize the name.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator mean to say that in a case in which the United States has been a party, so that we are bound by it, the final tribunals have determined that we have no title to this land?

Mr. SARGENT. I state, as I said before, that I understand the title of this person has been recognized by the local courts. I am so informed by the Department.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to know if the Senator has any communication on that subject?

Mr. SARGENT. Yes, sir; the communications were before the committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have them read.

Mr. SARGENT. In a few moments I can get them. I will have to go to the committee-room and tell the clerk to bring them here.

Mr. BOGY. If the Senator will pardon me, I will state that this same subject was before the Committee on Indian Affairs, and the amount specified in this bill is the result of a compromise. The owner of the claim wanted a much larger compensation. We finally agreed to offer him $15,000, which he agreed to accept with a great deal of hesitation. By the act of 1848 six hundred and forty acres of land were appropriated for all missionary establishments in Oregon Territory. This was one of those establishments regularly made, and has been recognized by the Government of the United States, has been regularly surveyed, and the survey has been regularly approved, and the title, in my estimation and in the estimation of the committee, and I believe it is so recognized by the Commissioner of the Land Department, is beyond all controversy, beyond all doubt, based upon the law of 1848 securing to every establishment of this character six hundred and forty acres of land in the Territory of Oregon.

By treaty made subsequently with the Nez Percé Indians these six hundred and forty acres were included in a large reservation made for those Indians, and the Government has taken possession of that land, and has upon that land very extensive improvements, in buildings, houses, mills, and shops, and the whole entire agency indeed is upon these six hundred and forty acres. The owner of the land would prefer to have his land. It is no doubt worth to him a great deal more now than $15,000.

The Committee on Indian Affairs took all the pains they could in examining the matter. We also corresponded with the Commissioner of the General Land Office, who laid before us all the papers. The survey, I repeat, of that land has been approved, and the title of the missionary society is beyond all doubt, and there is a regular deed from that society to this gentleman; I believe his name is Langford. His title therefore being good, and we having taken possession of his land, and having put large improvements upon that land, we can do no less than pay him for his land or give him possession of his property, and the price here fixed is the result of a compromise made between him and the Commissioner on Indian Affairs.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is very extraordinary indeed, as it appears to me—no doubt I am wrong—that the Department of the Interior having charge of the location of reservations and having in its own possession the records which would show whether the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions had lawfully located these six hundred and forty acres for their purposes under the act referred to by my friend from Missouri, should have run the Government into an obligation to pay twenty-five dollars an acre for this land in the Territory of Idaho where we established an Indian reservation. Somebody, in my opinion, deserves censure. The idea that we, in a Territory, are obliged to pay twenty-five dollars an acre for our own land, or land that has been located by somebody else, when there are thousands of square miles there, in order to establish an Indian reservation, is, as it appears to me, a very extraordinary thing. I hope it does not happen very often. Here we are to pay $15,000, which is about twenty-five dollars an acre, for land in the Territory of Idaho, a square mile of land claimed by this man Langford, because we have established an Indian reservation there. It is said he claims a great deal more. Does the Senator from Missouri mean to say that this land, aside from the improvements, is worth twenty-five dollars an acre in Idaho Territory?

Mr. BOGY. I understand it is a most excellent body of land and is very valuable aside from the improvements; that it is a very fine selection of very valuable land. It may not be so valuable as twenty-five dollars an acre; but it is a very fine selection of very valuable land, worth six or eight thousand dollars without any improvements at all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Missouri, with his usual candor, states I have no doubt correctly, that this land itself may be worth six or eight dollars an acre. Now we propose to pay twenty-five dollars an acre for it on account of the improvements that we put upon it ourselves.

Mr. BOGY. The Senator will pardon me. A large part of the improvements was put there by the board of foreign missions, and is there yet.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What are the improvements?

Mr. BOGY. Houses, mills, shops, saw-mills, and grist-mills. All the agency establishments are upon that land.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How did it happen—perhaps there is an explanation of it—that the Indian Department came to locate their reservation embracing this private property? What is the history of that?

Mr. BOGY. That would be very hard for me to answer. By treaties made with the Nez Percé Indians, they were located upon this land, and this is within the reservation, and by the terms of the treaty no white man is allowed to remain among those Indians unless officers of the Government, or Indian agents.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no expectation, of course, of preventing the adoption of this amendment; but I have the expectation of putting on the record what has been disclosed by the Senator from Missouri in respect of this most extraordinary transaction; and that is, that this man Langford year after year has had a bill here to provide for buying out his claim to this Indian reservation, the United States having been the original proprietors.

Mr. ALCORN. I will inquire, for information, whether the question of this title has been at any time adjudicated by any committee of this body? Has it been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. BOGY. It was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. ALCORN. The Committee on Indian Affairs, I believe, is not composed of lawyers.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. They are all lawyers but one.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We have a legend which the Senator from California gives us, and he does the best he can, that some local court has decided, as he understands, that the title of the United States is not good. It is a mere legend. We have no evidence of it. My friend from California has no evidence of it at all; he has heard so; and in the face of having located an Indian reservation there, we put into this miscellaneous appropriation bill a provision that we shall buy this disputed title to our own land—it was once our own land and for aught we have in evidence to the contrary is still our own land—and will give $15,000 for it in view of the improvements, not that this man, but somebody else, put upon it.

It may be all right, Mr. President, and I dare say it is, because the Committee on Appropriations have recommended it. I shall have done my duty in calling the attention of the Senate to the extraordinary nature of the circumstance that Senate bill No. 630, introduced on the 26th of March, has got into the body of this appropriation bill in spite of the efforts of my friend from Maine, who, no doubt truly, states that he has done his best to keep this bill clear from private bills of this character. I find that Senate bill No. 630, now on your Calendar, is a slightly enlarged edition of this amendment, containing the essential features of the amendment precisely.

Now, Mr. President, I ask the Senate to vote in favor of leaving this subject for further consideration at another session of this Congress in order that we may have from the Department or somebody a definite report which points out, either upon this bill which is on your Calendar for Langford or in some other way, why it is that the United States, in a Territory where we have millions of acres of land, is to be called upon to pay $15,000 to a private claimant for a part of this reservation without any judicial determination against our title.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I desire to say a word before the vote is taken on this question. I do not wonder that the Senator from Vermont puts his inquiries. I do not know how any man can look at this claim without making inquiries about it. I do not hesitate to say that when it was presented to the Committee on Indian Affairs they were somewhat puzzled to know how a man like Mr. Langford or any other man could possess by title the land in an Indian reservation; but on inquiry we were perfectly satisfied that that land, six hundred and forty acres, was originally conveyed by the Government to the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, and that the title in that board was as good as the title which I hold to the house which I occupy. Then we were satisfied also that the American board of missions sold this property to a man by the name of Langford for a very small consideration without doubt.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator from Connecticut was it granted to the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions in fee, or only for the uses of their mission?

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I understand in fee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think the Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I do not think I am. The Senator asks whether the fee was in this board. I have no doubt of it. Without it they could not have conveyed the fee to Mr. Langford. Certificates from the records of the courts, local courts I suppose, came to the Interior Department and came before the Committee on Indian Affairs showing very clearly that the title to this land was in this man Langford.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear those papers read.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I have not got them and cannot read them or produce them to be read.

Then I would say still further, the question came up in regard to the value of the land and the necessity of its being reowned by the United States Government, and we found that the Government had established an Indian agency which covered this land, on which the Government had erected buildings of great value. If they had erected them on my land, or on the land owned by the Senator from Vermont, it would have been necessary for them to purchase that land of him or me or remove the buildings. The information which we get from the Interior Department is substantially that they cannot remove those buildings or occupy any other land in connection with that reservation, which is nearly of as much value as this, which is nearly as important to the Government, and the Government cannot remove these improvements without great loss. It may be that the Government has occupied that land in such a manner as to make the gain very great to Mr. Langford; it may be impossible to avoid it; but that is not so much his fault as that of the Government.

The question came up before the Committee on Indian Affairs in regard to the value of this property. Affidavits were presented to that committee which stated that the property was worth, independent of the improvements, from forty to sixty thousand dollars. From whom were these affidavits? I must say I know not. They were by men at a distance, so far off that we could not address them, although there came with those affidavits certificates that the affiants were men of integrity and reliable.

Then the question came up, what shall the committee do for the interests of the Government? Shall we submit it to the courts to determine whether the Government shall take possession of it or not? Shall we submit the question to arbitrators and let them determine what the damage shall be to Langford? If that question should be submitted to any three disinterested men, however well they might be selected, residing in that country, we could not believe in the face of these affidavits that they would give the Government the property as cheap as we propose to buy it now. Believing as I do that this is the most economical way for the Government to get out of this difficulty and to get possession of this property which is essential in order to secure the improvements which they have made, I hope this amendment will be concurred in.

Mr. OGLESBY. I hope the Senate will concur in the amendment as recommended by the Committee on Appropriations, and indeed I am very glad to see it in the bill. I suppose it got there through the instrumentality of the honorable Senator from Oregon, [Mr. KELLY.] This claim came before the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate months ago. We gave it careful consideration. A bill was sent down from the Secretary of the Interior providing for settling this claim by arbitration or settling it by a proceeding in the district court of Idaho.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Will the Senator from Illinois inform the Senate when these improvements by the Government were placed upon this land?

Mr. OGLESBY. If the Senator from Massachusetts will take my recollection about it, I can state, within the last twenty years.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I should imagine it would be within the last twenty years. It is only twenty-four or twenty-five years since the land was ceded to the missionary society.

Mr. OGLESBY. I will state to the Senate just what I know about it and as briefly as I can.

Mr. BOUTWELL. If the Senator will allow me, I will state to him what is the suspicious aspect of this case, and as I have known one other in my experience in the Government which was precisely what I suspect this to be I will state it. Whoever put the improvements made by the Government upon this land, the title to it having been confirmed in 1848, knew perfectly well that he was doing that which he had no right to do, and was placing the property of the Government upon land the title to which was in another party. In my judgment, although I have no evidence on the point, there can be no doubt that there was an arrangement and understanding between the person who held the title to this land and the officer of the Government by whose agency the improvements were placed upon it. It is incredible that any other state of facts could have led to the present condition of things.

Mr. OGLESBY. I think the Government will be the gainer, and largely the gainer, by concurring in the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations. Now I will state, and I hope I shall do it in less than five minutes, what I know about it.

The case came before the Committee on Indian Affairs. It was there referred to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] or myself, I think to me, with a bill from the Secretary of the Interior providing that a suit should be brought or that a board or arbitrators should be appointed to settle what the Government owed Mr. Langford. The Government of the United States, through the executive department, officially recognized to Mr. Langford his title in the property. He brought suit in ejectment against the possessors in the territorial courts of Idaho, and received a judgment of ouster and putting him in possession again; and that judgment stands to-day from which the Government has taken no appeal, and it has made no objection to the judgment. It was a regular judgment rendered in an action of ejectment, and the man has stood waiting and waiting to get possession and cannot get possession because he cannot sue the Government to put it out. The property belongs to him. The title was conveyed to him by duly acknowledged deeds from this missionary society. He was put in possession; and it being peculiarly located, far off in the Indian-exposed portions of Oregon, when the Government went there and established an Indian agency, the Government had no other ground, no other place it could go and protect the life of its agent. Therefore it went upon this ground, where a mill has been constructed, a saw-mill and a grist-mill, and the Government went and made material additions to it and took possession of it in order to preserve the life of the Government agent there and to make it a center for the distribution of food and annuities to the Indians, and hold it to this day.

The fear the Committee on Indian Affairs had was that if this Government should continue to hold this ground for a longer period, when this man had made repeated applications for it, it would finally end in a claim of fifty or one hundred thousand dollars against the Government. Therefore we put Mr. Langford off in the Committee on Indian Affairs. We resisted his claim and put him off. He said he was justly entitled to $40,000; but as a compromise, to settle it and let him get his money and get rid of all trouble, he finally agreed to take $20,000. The committee insisted that $10,000 was enough. The matter was referred to me, and I had a bill drawn up and reported to the Senate to give him $15,000, which amount he concluded he would not accept. He refused to accept it until I received this letter from him two weeks ago agreeing to accept the $15,000. [Here the hammer fell.] Is my time up?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPENCER. I move that the Senate recede from its amendment to House bill No. 899, to constitute Montgomery, in the State of Alabama, a port of delivery.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us dispose of this bill first.

Mr. SARGENT. I object to any business being interposed until we dispose of the appropriation bill.

Mr. OGLESBY. Here is a letter from Mr. Langford agreeing to accept $15,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senator will be allowed to proceed. I move that he have leave to proceed

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves that the Senator from Illinois have leave to proceed without limitation.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. OGLESBY. The honorable Senator from Vermont will allow me to return him my sincere thanks for this courtesy. I will agree to proceed with pleasure if he will promise not to follow me. [Laughter.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. It would be perfectly hopeless. I make the promise.

Mr. OGLESBY. The Committee on Indian Affairs believed, and now believe, that this is the best settlement the Government can ever make of this claim. I have a letter from Mr. Langford, who finally agrees to take $15,000 and settle the matter. If you send it back to that country and allow him to call up witnesses over that Territory to prove the value of that property in a court of justice, the Government will have to pay fifty or one hundred thousand dollars for that land. His title is clear; it is unimpeachable. There is no use to deny it. He has papers from the Government in his possession admitting the title. Now, then, when we have got him to consent to take $15,000 and give a warranty deed to the Government for six hundred and forty acres, give us the title and get rid of the difficulty, my opinion is the Senate will make a mistake if they do not accept the offer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KELLY. I wish to make a statement about this matter as the amendment was suggested by myself. I can indorse everything that has been said by the Senator from Illinois, and I will ask the Clerk to read a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs showing the amount of money the Government has expended upon that land, the title to which certainly belongs to Mr. Langford. There can be no doubt about it, as the Senator from Illinois has said.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Where is the evidence of that, let me ask the Senator? I should like to have it read if there is any evidence of that kind.

Mr. KELLY. I will read it. Mr. Langford holds this land under the seventh section of the act of the 14th of August, 1848, the proviso of which is as follows:

And provided also, That the title to the land, not exceeding six hundred and forty acres, now occupied as missionary stations among the Indian tribes in said Territory, and improvements thereon, be confirmed and established in the several religious societies to which said missionary stations respectively belong.

Again, on the 2d of March, 1853, when the Territory of Washington was organized, there was this provision:

Provided further, That the title to the land, not exceeding six hundred and forty acres, now occupied as missionary stations among the Indian tribes in said Territory, or that may have been so occupied as missionary stations prior to the passage of the act establishing the territorial government of Oregon, with the improvements thereon, be, and the same is hereby, confirmed to the several religious societies to which said missionary stations severally belong.

I will say that this society was established in 1836 among the Nez Percé Indians, and from that time until what was called the Whitman massacre they continued to occupy this as a missionary station. I say there can be no doubt as to the title.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator says there is no doubt about the title, and he reads from a statute.

Mr. KELLY. I do, as quoted in the House report.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is a copy of the statute, I suppose.

Mr. KELLY. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In which he says the title is conferred upon the missionary or religious societies.

Mr. KELLY. "Confirmed."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now where is the statute which gives the original title?

Mr. KELLY. The original title was under the act of the 14th of August, 1848.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does that provide for any alienation by this religious corporation to its successors or assigns?

Mr. KELLY. It confirmed the title to the society.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But that is not the point, the Senator will see as a lawyer. My point is whether in the original act or in this one, certainly not in this one, there are any words which say that the land is confirmed to the successors and assigns of this religious corporation.

Mr. KELLY. I do not pretend to say that there are such words.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then if there are not such words, does the Senator say they had a right to alienate this title?

Mr. KELLY. I do say so, certainly. I do say when a title is confirmed to any religious body, that that body is the owner of the land, and that that body has the right to dispose of that land if it thinks proper. They did dispose of it to Mr. Langford. It has been so found by the committee of the Senate and of the House. I am reading from the House report. I say that there can be no doubt about the title.

Before my time expires I wish simply to have read a letter showing that the Indian Department have expended in improvement upon that land $66,000 in buildings, all of which strictly belongs to Mr. Langford. He brought suit, served process upon the Indian agent, judgment was obtained after a contest, and he has it now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the date of that judgment?

Mr. KELLY. I do not remember. It was there three or four years ago.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why was not an appeal taken?

Mr. KELLY. I cannot account for that. I suppose for the simple reason that they knew there was no hope of gaining it for the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there a copy of the record here that we can hear read?

Mr. KELLY. It was before the committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is it here?

Mr. KELLY. I do not know; I am not on the committee. I know there was presented to the committee a certified copy of the record. I now ask to have the letter which I send to the desk read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C., June 19, 1874.

SIR: In reply to your verbal inquiry, you are advised that it appears from the books of this office that the following sums have been appropriated and placed in the hands of the agent of the Nez Percé Indians since 1860 for improvements on the lands occupied for the agency of said Indians in the Territory of Idaho, and it is presumed have been expended for such purpose, namely:

For the erection of schools and church buildings	$24,700 00
For the erection of blacksmith-shop	5,500 00
For the erection of saw and flouring-mill	19,000 00
For the erection of hospital building	2,400 00
For the erection of buildings for employés	6,500 00
For the erection of buildings for chiefs	34 000 00
Total	61,55C 00

In addition to the foregoing the sum of $4,600 is appropriated annually for keeping said buildings in repair, &c.

There is also embraced within the six hundred and forty acres occupied by the agency fifteen Indian farms, improved and cultivated for the use of the Indians of said agency.

This tract of land on which these improvements have been made by the Government out of Indian funds is that covered by the execution of W. G. Langford vs. Robert Newell, United States Indian agent, from the district court of the first judicial district of Idaho Territory.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

EDWARD P. SMITH,
Commissioner.

W. G. LANGFORD, Esq.,
Washington, D. C.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I only want to say to the Senate that we had better find out whether the Government has been the victim of a fraud, as is pretty evident from so much of the transaction as we are made acquainted with, before we decide to pay any sum of money, however small, to one of the parties or the representative of one of the parties, to this fraud; for nothing can be clearer than that the agent of the Government who put this property, churches, stores, and mills upon this land was perfectly well aware that the Government in some sense had parted with the right to control the land—not the ownership of it, not the fee of the land. It was dedicated to a certain purpose in the hands of the missionary society; but I do not believe from the statute that it was an alienable title which the society took from the Government. There are no words in it that authorize the society to alienate the title. At any rate we should stand where we are, and not be deterred by the idea that a claim may arise years hence of $50,000 or $100,000. We should not allow a party to a fraud to take $20,000 or $10,000 or $10 out of the Treasury through the fear that this Government cannot resist those parties.

The excuse that the Indian agency and the buildings of the Government and other property were put upon the missionary lands for the purpose of defense against the Indians is absurd, inasmuch as the missionary agency was there, if these Indians were hostile, under the protection of the Government, and the Government had the power to protect its own agents elsewhere as well as upon the property of the missionary society. My judgment is that the design of this proceeding, as it originated in Idaho, (without the knowledge of course of any member of any committee of either branch of Congress,) is to take from the Government money through a fraudulent intent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 26, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Bayard, Bogy, Buckingham, Carpenter, Clayton, Conover, Cooper, Davis, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Gilbert, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Harvey, Kelly, McCreery, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Oglesby, Pease, Ransom, Sargent, Stockton, Thurman, and Wadleigh—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Boutwell, Chandler, Edmunds, Fenton, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Hager, Hamilton of Texas, Howe, Ingalls, Merrimon, Morrill of Vermont, Robertson, Schurz, Scott, Stewart, Tipton, and Wright—19.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Boreman, Brownlow, Cameron, Conkling, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Ferry of Connecticut, Hamlin, Hitchcock, Johnston, Jones, Lewis, Logan, Morton, Norwood, Patterson, Pratt, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Sherman, Spencer, Sprague, Stevenson, Washburn, West, and Windom—28.

So the amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was in line 507 to increase the appropriation for surveying the public lands in Nebraska from $40,000 to $80,000.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was in line 529 to increase the appropriation for surveying the public lands in Idaho Territory from $20,000 to $30,000.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was in line 555 to increase the appropriation for surveying the public lands of Oregon from $40,000 to $60,000.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was in line 563 to increase the appropriation for surveying the public lands in Washington Territory from $40,000 to $60,000.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was after line 612 to insert:

For the necessary expenses of the land office at the Dalles, Oregon, for salaries and commissions of the register and receiver for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, $6,000, and for incidental expenses of said office, $1,000.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was after line 615 to insert:

For lathing and plastering the under surface of the roof above the ceiling of the Senate Chamber, $4,000.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was after line 618 to insert:

For a new steam-pump to supply the tanks located in the attic of the Senate wing of the Capitol, $800.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was after line 621 to insert:

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was after line 626 to insert:

For a commission, consisting of Fred. Law Olmsted, of New York; William Hammond Hall, of San Francisco, and H. W. S. Cleveland, of Chicago, to consider and report to Congress at its next session by what economical measures the greatest public value may be given to the connected series of Government grounds, including those of the Capitol and those of the Executive Mansion, the sum of $1,500.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was after line 634 to insert the following:

For improvement of Capitol grounds, according to the plans and under the general direction of Fred. Law Olmsted and the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Senate, to be expended by the architect of the Capitol, $200,000.

Mr. SARGENT. At the time that amendment was adopted in Committee of the Whole the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] stated that he would consider that matter and offer an appropriate amendment. I think from what he outlined his idea was that it should be under the charge of the chairman of the committee of the House and the chairman of the committee of the Senate; the House would hardly agree that this improvement should be under the sole control of the Senate. I ask if he is ready with his amendment? If not, I will move that amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I hope there will be no such amendment offered.

Mr. SARGENT. Then the words "and the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Senate" should be stricken out. I move to strike out those words.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was to strike out lines 639 to 642, inclusive, in the following words:

For improving the Capitol grounds, for coping and flagging the foot-walks around the same, and for paving the roadway at the eastern front, $125,000.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was in line 647 after the words "engine-house" to insert "and stable," and in line 649 to increase the appropriation "for the purpose of erecting on Capitol Hill near the Capitol building a suitable engine-house and stable to supply the place of engine-house No. 3 recently ordered removed by Congress," from $10,000 to $15,000.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was to strike out lines 650, 651, and 652 in the following words:

For preservation and repairs of the United States court-house in Washington City, formerly known as the City Hall building, $3,000.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

For extending court-house (old City Hall) in the city of Washington, in accordance with plans of the architect of the Capitol, to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior, for the accommodation of the District courts, Court of Claims, and the Pension Office, and for making the necessary repairs to the old building, $150,000.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, when that amendment was before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, I asked the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to consent to an amendment which would allow the architect either to extend the present building or to erect a new one. That proposition was declined. I did not then know, I had not then seen, the plan which it seems now has already been provided for extending the present building. Since that time I have seen that plan. I have no hope of changing the purpose of the Senate to agree to that. I only want to enter my protest against it. I do think it would be a great calamity to make this appropriation and to undertake to extend that building. It will be simply erecting a permanent scab on the finest square in the city, to spread over the whole territory there between D and E streets an enlargement of the horse-barracks which already stand there, and which will be a monument for posterity to swear at as long as the building stands. [Laughter.] I want to save myself from receiving any of those anathemas.

The traveler who hereafter shall have occasion to leave East Capitol street and go to Seventeenth street will pass by those buildings to start with. On his way, he will encounter the Post Office, the Interior Department, the Treasury building, and he will bring up at that new State Department which is now being erected—buildings that are not excelled by any in the world; but on his course he will have to pass the building which my excellent friend from Vermont designs placing on this splendid square. I do not think any man of a sensitive nature can travel over that whole course without being thrown into a fever and ague. [Laughter.] I shall have to take the avenue after that building is put up, for my constitution will not stand that route, I know. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The Senator from Wisconsin has a happy faculty of making even respectable things look ridiculous whenever he attempts it. The idea of the committee that reported this amendment was that we should have some means of immediate accommodation for the courts of the District, for the Court of Claims, and for the Pension Bureau now confined to the Seaton House; and this building can be extended under the general style which it now assumes, fronting on Four and a half street, and make a very respectable appearance, and furnish a very large amount of accommodations, and that at an early day. It is economy to finish this building and furnish quarters for these courts, for the Pension Bureau, and for the Court of Claims.

I do not think that the building as it is proposed will give the fever and ague generally; and unless the Senator from Wisconsin is predisposed to that ailment, I do not think that this building when erected will produce any such results. The whole building can be completed at $239,000 additional cost. We propose to appropriate $150,000 of it this year and the balance next year, and the amount appropriated for this year will furnish present and immediate accommodation for the Pension Bureau and the courts. Any gentleman who desires to do so can see the proposed changes, as I have them before me, and they are not to be adopted until approved by a member of the Cabinet.

Mr. HOWE. Temporary accommodations twice as large as are proposed here can be had by putting up board shanties or canvas tents, and then they can be taken down when you no longer have any use for them, and they will not offend anybody.

Now my honorable friend holds up here what seems to be the ground-plan. If he will really resolve that into one of the elevations it will not be so offensive as the elevation that he has had drawn by the architect, [laughter;] and if he would so amend his plan immediately it would be less offensive to me. I do not particularly distrust my own constitution; I never had the fever and ague in my life; and I do not believe I ever shall have, unless I am called upon to pass that building. There is what I suppose is one of the elevations, [exhibiting to the Senate.] I should be a little reluctant after all to say that it was designed for horse-barracks. It looks more to me like a national dove-cote. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I desire to say one thing about this proposition. If Congress is disposed to spread a million or a million and a half of money for the same amount of accomodations, so be it. In my opinion this building is not really subject to the criticism of the Senator from Wisconsin. It is not a beautiful building at all, and yet it is not such a monstrosity as he would represent it to be. I think that for the sake of economy, and for the reason that we ought not at the present moment to launch out into very much more of an expenditure for this city at the present time, we ought to accept this proposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendment.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was to insert after line 664:

To secure the foundation walls and fit up rooms in the basement of the General Post-Office building $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was after line 685 to insert:

To pay the indebtedness incurred and now due, and to pay, in part, the expenses of the Reform School of the District of Columbia, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, it being for food and clothing of the boys in said school, the sum of $15,000; to be deducted from any money hereafter appropriated for the District of Columbia.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, in the appropriations for the Columbia Institute for the Deaf and Dumb, was after line 733 to insert:

For continuing the work on the erection, and fitting up the buildings, of the institution, in accordance with plans heretofore submitted to Congress, $20,000.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was after line 761 to insert:

For the Women's Christian Association of the District of Columbia, $25,000; to be expended for the sole purpose of erecting a building on the ground owned by said association in said District, upon and in strict conformity with a plan for said building, which shall be prepared by the architect of the Capitol extension; and it shall not, for building and furnishing, exceed the said sum of $25,000; and no money shall be paid under this appropriation until the Secretary of the Treasury shall be satisfied that a contract, with good security for its execution, has been entered into for the erection and furnishing of said building, at a sum not exceeding the amount hereby appropriated; and all payments for the erection and furnishing of said building shall be made by the Secretary of the Treasury directly upon vouchers to be approved by him: Provided, (and this appropriation is upon the express condition,) That none of the money hereby appropriated shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury until said association shall file with the recorder of deeds in the District of Columbia a declaration, executed and acknowledged in the manner in which deeds are required by law to be executed for record in the District of Columbia, that said building and the lands on which it is erected, forever, shall be held in trust by said association, without mortgage or security in the nature of mortgage, for the sole purposes of said association, as defined in its charter, of date of December 13, 1870; and the filing of said declaration shall be regarded as notice to all persons who shall purchase said property or take any security thereon.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was on page 33, after line 792, to insert:

For the Little Sisters of the Poor of Washington City, to liquidate a debt on the building and to complete said building, $25,000.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was on page 35, after line 843, to insert:

For building a steamer for the Coast Survey, for use on the gulf coast, $76,000.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was after line 849 to insert:

For the maintenance and support of the Hydrographic Office, including surveys of ocean currents, reefs, and shoals, and incidental expenses, $50,000.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was on page 37 to strike out lines 888, 889, and 890, as follows:

To pay commissions allowed by law to collectors of customs acting as superintendents of lights, $8,000.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was after line 898 to insert:

For re-establishing the light-house at Indian Island, at Rockport Harbor, Maine, $9,000.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was in line 939, on page 39, to strike out "Navasink," and insert "New Brunswick," and to strike out the proviso commencing in line 939, as follows:

Provided, That whenever it may become necessary, in the adjustment of boundary lines or in the opening or changing of necessary roadways affecting lands belonging to the United States and used for the purposes of the light-house establishment at Staten Island, New York, and at the Highlands of Navasink, New Jersey, or any part thereof, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to execute for such purposes, touching the property above referred to or any part thereof, the necessary conveyances and assurances, and to receive in consideration therefor such other conveyances or assurances of adjoining lands, or of lands in the immediate vicinity, or other consideration, as may be agreed upon.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was to strike out the following clause, commencing in line 955:

And the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to place a fog-bell (to be rung during the prevalence of a fog) at such points at or near the entrance to the harbor of New York as may be designated by the proper officers; the expenses thereof to be paid out of any unappropriated money in the Treasury.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. SARGENT. I move that with the exception of the amendment of the Committee of the Whole relating to the Light-House Board on the Mississippi River, the other amendments of the Committee of the Whole be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. In reference to that amendment——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read first.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, struck out the following words, commencing in line 1075:

That the jurisdiction of the Light-House Board created by the act entitled "An act making appropriations for light-houses, light-boats, buoys, &c., and providing for the erection and establishment of the same and for other purposes," approved August 31, 1852, is hereby extended over the Mississippi, Ohio, and Missouri Rivers, for the establishment of such beacon-lights, day-beacons, and buoys as may be necessary for the use of vessels navigating those streams; and for this purpose the said board is hereby required to divide the designated rivers into one or two additional light-house districts, to be in all respects similar to the already existing light-house districts; and is hereby authorized to lease the necessary ground for all such lights and beacons as are used to point out changeable channels, and which in consequence cannot be made permanent.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask on behalf of the Committee on Appropriations, after an informal consultation, that that amendment be non-concurred in.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Mr. SARGENT. On behalf of the committee I offer the following amendment, to come on page 26, after line 621:

For salary of assistant engineer of the Senate in charge of the elevator and elevator-engine, $1,450.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT. I renew the amendment which I withdrew in Committee of the Whole, to which I presume there will be no objection.

For compensation of the Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury, the Solicitor of the Treasury, and the Commissioner of Customs, each, $4,500 per annum; and a sum sufficient to pay the amount of increase of these salaries is hereby appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENSON. I offer another amendment which was objected to on a point of order, which the Senator from Vermont has withdrawn:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay the late firm of Dempsey & O'Toole, as indemnity for loss sustained by them by annulment of a contract with the Post-Office Department for furnishing stamped envelopes and newspaper wrappers, the sum of $29,433.89: Provided, That previous to the payment of the sum before mentioned the said Dempsey & O'Toole shall deliver up, to the satisfaction of the Postmaster-General, all dies and dandy-rolls by them used and provided for the manufacture of the envelopes aforesaid: And provided further, That the sum aforesaid shall be received in full satisfaction for all claims and demands of the said Dempsey & O'Toole for or by reason of the annulment of said contract.

Mr. WRIGHT. My recollection is that that is the same claim precisely which was before the Committee on Claims and rejected.

Mr. STEVENSON. I know it is not.

Mr. DAVIS. I beg to correct the Senator from Iowa. This is not the same claim, but it is a claim of the same parties.

Mr. STEVENSON. I inquired into that point myself.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT. I have an amendment that was left in charge of a member of the Committee on Finance who has been called out upon a committee of conference, one which will require unanimous consent, and when I state that the officer who sends it says that it will save $600,000 to the country, I presume there will be no objection. The amendment is to add as a new section:

That so much of the act entitled "An act to make appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, and for other purposes," as provides "for replacing the worn and mutilated circulating notes of national banking associations and for engraving and preparing, in such manner and on such paper and in such form and design as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, new circulating notes for such associations to replace notes of designs and denominations now successfully counterfeited, $600,000: Provided, That each of a said national banking associations shall reimburse the Treasury of the United States the cost of the circulating notes furnished under this provision," be, and the same is hereby repealed.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I object to the amendment. Is it in order?

Mr. SCOTT. There is no appropriation in it, I will inform the Senator from South Carolina. It is to repeal a section of a bill of last year.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I ask if that amendment is in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not if objected to.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina raises a point of order, and the Chair sustains it.

Mr. INGALLS. At the request of the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN,] who is temporarily absent from the Chamber, I offer the following amendment, to come in on page 60, line 1463:

To enable the Joint Committee on the Library of Congress to procure plans for extending the east and west fronts of the Capitol so as to enlarge the accommodations for the Library and perfect the central building, $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. When the Senate was in Committee of the Whole I offered two amendments to this bill which were obnoxious to an objection made at that time. The objection having been withdrawn, I am encouraged to try them again. I offer the following amendment, to be inserted after line 598:

For this amount, or so much thereof as may be required to meet certain indebtedness on account of the Indian service at the Malheur reservation in Oregon during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, $16,145.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Let the Senator explain the amendment.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I object to the amendment.

Mr. MITCHELL. I hope the Senator from South Carolina will not object.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Is the amendment in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Then I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. ANTHONY. On page 12, after line 267, I move to amend by adding:

And the Congressional Printer is directed to bid for the same at the estimated cost of performing the work.

I do not know why an exception is made of this work of printing to the general rule that prevails throughout the bill. This work is the Official Postal Guide.

Mr. SARGENT. I think the amendment is good. I should like to have the Public Printer compete for that printing.

Mr. ANTHONY. I was asking that some member of the committee would explain to me why it is that this work is made an exception to the general rule that runs through the bill requiring that all printing shall be done at the Government Printing Office.

Mr. SARGENT. This is a clause put in in the House. We did not see fit to strike it out or put it on any other, because we thought this work ought to be printed. The amendment now moved will certainly give an opportunity to the Public Printer to have the money expended by him.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. I wish to offer another amendment which I cannot offer except by unanimous consent. Yesterday a joint resolution was passed directing the Congressional Printer to prepare a careful statement of the cost of printing the RECORD for a year, in order that we might compare it with the cost of printing the debates at private establishments and with the estimates that might be made by other parties. This cannot be done without an additional clerk. I therefore ask leave to offer an amendment which I am aware is not in order unless by general consent. It comes from the Committee on Printing, and it is not in order only because it was not referred to the Committee on Appropriations; but the Senate will recollect that it was only yesterday that the joint resolution was passed which made this necessary. The amendment is:

For one clerk of the third class to keep the accounts of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as required by the joint resolution of Congress.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I object.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the Senator from South Carolina indulge me by allowing me to suggest that Congress yesterday directed the Congressional Printer to do a certain thing; that thing cannot be done without the employment of a clerk. Are we to order him to do a thing and then refuse him the means of doing it? I think the Senator will withdraw his objection on that statement.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I think there are quite enough items in the bill without making further appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will submit to the Senate the question whether the amendment shall be received.

The question being put, it was declared that the ayes appeared to prevail.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I raise the point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate have decided the point of order.

Mr. SARGENT. The amendment being before the Senate, I move to amend it by striking out "third class" and inserting "first class." Certainly a first-class clerk should be competent for this business.

Mr. ANTHONY. I accept that.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. DENNIS. I rise to offer an amendment——

Mr. ROBERTSON. I rise to a point of order. Is it quite fair that the Chair receives some amendments and objects to others?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not. It is in the power of the Senate to do what they please. The Chair submitted the question to the Senate whether they would receive the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island, and they decided that they would, and the Chair could not prevent it.

Mr. DENNIS. I offer the following amendment:

To enable the Secretary of the Senate to pay a sum sufficient to make the salaries of the principal clerk, principal executive clerk, minute and Journal clerk, and financial clerk of the Senate as follows: Principal clerk, $3,600; principal executive clerk, minute and Journal clerk, and financial clerk, $3,000; and a sum sufficient to make the annual salaries of seven of the clerks in the office of the Secretary $2,592 each, $4,836.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAYARD. I offer an amendment, on page 66, after line 1624, to insert:

For furniture, books, and paper-cases, gas-fixtures, carpets, and mats for the United States court-room and clerk's office, Wilmington, Delaware, $2,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the amendment?

Mr. ROBERTSON. I object, and raise the point of order.

Mr. BAYARD. May I state to my friend from South Carolina that this amendment is not objected to by the Committee on Appropriations. It is absolutely required in order to make these offices of use to the Government.

Mr. STEVENSON. I suggest that this amendment is in order. It is to carry on the public service.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STOCKTON. I have an amendment to offer which is strictly within the rule, as I think. I am directed by the Committee on Naval Affairs to offer the amendment, and I desire to say in addition that the Naval Committee of the House have considered the proposition and have agreed to it, but the bill is not in a condition to pass in the House at this moment, not being in accordance with their rules——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks it is out of order to refer thus to the proceedings of the other House. The amendment will be sent to the desk and it will be read.

Mr. STOCKTON. The amendment has the approval of the Naval Committee, who have directed me to offer it. I gave notice of it some days ago and it has been referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and I hope and believe the Committee on Appropriations also approve of it. I will add that it is the settlement of a matter that has been often before the Senate and they have always been in favor of it; but we have never been able to get to a direct conclusion on the subject. I hope the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will accept my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from New Jersey will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to pay to the widow of the late Rear-Admiral John A. Dahlgren $50,000 for and on account of the past use and the right hereafter to use, in the manufacture of ordnance and projectiles by the United States, each of the improvements patented by said Dahlgren in the form, the mode of casting, and the finish of naval ordnance and in cast-iron shells; and a sufficient sum for this purpose is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is too large a sum to go in this way. It has not been examined by the committee. I feel constrained to raise the question of order on that. It is a private claim.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator insist on the point of order?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. STOCKTON. What is the point of order? The Senator rose and addressed the Chair in a tone of voice that I could not hear.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine will restate his point of order.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That it is a private claim.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. STOCKTON. I should like to inquire as to that. This amendment was referred to the Committee on Appropriations by the Committee on Naval Affairs. I offered it by direction of the Naval Committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the rule for the information of the Senator.

Mr. STOCKTON. I know of no rule that forbids it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. Rule 30 provides at the close:

And no amendment shall be received whose object is to provide for a private claim, unless it be to carry out the provisions of an existing law or a treaty stipulation.

Mr. STOCKTON. On the objection made by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. ROBERTSON] a moment or two ago the Chair decided that the Senate had the matter in its own power and by a majority vote could put any amendment on the bill. I now claim the benefit of that decision of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will submit the question in this case as in that. The question is, Will the Senate receive this amendment?

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 19, noes 27.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President——

Mr. STOCKTON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Several SENATORS. Too late.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will entertain the call.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on receiving the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey. The point of order is raised that the amendment is excluded by the rule. The Chair is of that opinion, but at the request of the Senator from New Jersey, submits the question to the Senate.

Mr. STOCKTON. I withdraw the request for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the call for the yeas and nays may be withdrawn. The Chair hears none. The amendment is not received.

Mr. SCOTT. The Senator from South Carolina gave me to understand that he would withdraw the objection which he made to the amendment I offered a few minutes ago, coming from the Comptroller of the Currency.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be again read and regarded as a new offering of the amendment.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

That so much of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, and for other purposes," as provides "for replacing the worn and mutilated circulating notes of national banking associations, and for engraving and preparing, in such manner and on such paper and of such form and design as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, new circulating notes for such associations to replace notes of a design and denomination now successfully counterfeited, $600,000: Provided, That each of said national banking associations shall reimburse the Treasury the costs of the circulating notes furnished under this provision," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I should like to have a statement as to that.

Mr. SCOTT. I will send to the Chair a letter which has been referred to the Committee on Finance in reference to that amendment.

The Secretary read the following letter:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE COMPTROLLER OF THE CURRENCY,
Washington, D. C., June 13, 1874.

SIR: I am quite confident that there will be no objection on the part of the Appropriation Committee to insert in the sundry civil appropriation bill a paragraph providing for the repeal of an item in the sundry civil bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, providing for the engraving of a new issue of national-bank notes, and I will thank you, if consistent with your views, to suggest to Senator MORRILL, of Maine, and other Senators upon that committee the necessity for such legislation.

Very respectfully,

JOHN JAY KNOX,
Comptroller.

Hon. JUSTIN S. MORRILL,
United States Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The amendment I understand comes from the Committee on Finance?

Mr. SCOTT. The members of the Committee on Finance have conferred together. The obligation remains to provide for the engraving of these new notes with this appropriation of $600,000. It cannot be done with that amount of money, and therefore it is a saving to the Treasury to repeal the clause altogether. There is no new appropriation.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I am directed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to offer the following amendment:

For additional pay to William E. Webster, assistant engineer of the Capitol in charge of the electric lighting apparatus of the Senate, $300, to take effect from and after the passage of this act.

Mr. SARGENT. What will that make his pay?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I will make a statement in relation to this amendment. I had been informed that the pay of this engineer was the same as that of the engineer in the House, who only has charge of the lighting overhead, but that is a mistake. He has the same pay, but he works throughout the day below and at night above, doing a day's work throughout the day and then this in addition. It seems to me that he is one of the hardest working men there is about the Capitol, and it has been the judgment of most of those who are conversant with the matter that he ought to have this addition.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator has not answered my question.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. He gets $1,400.

Mr. SARGENT. That is reasonable.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. I offer the following amendment:

For this amount, or so much thereof as may be required to meet certain indebtedness on account of the Indian service at the Malheur reservation in Oregon during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, $16,145.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Has not that been ruled out of order already?

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask that it be submitted to a vote of the Senate. It is recommended strongly by the Department of the Interior, and also by the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I raise the point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment was offered once before and ruled out of order. At the request of the Senator from Oregon, the Chair will submit the question to the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I wish to raise the point distinctly whether that is a question to be submitted to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The sixth rule provides that the Chair may submit every question of order to the Senate. Whenever the present occupant of the chair is appealed to by any Senator to do so, after stating his own opinion, he will always comply with that request.

Mr. SARGENT. If the question is whether the Chair has correctly construed the thirtieth rule, then unmistakably we must all vote "ay." On that naked question of law, which addresses itself to our honor and our respect for the Chair, we certainly must vote "ay." If it is a mere question whether we will oblige another Senator or whether we will allow this appropriation, that is different.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Submitting the question to the Senate is undoubtedly in the nature of an appeal, but a short-hand way to that result.

Mr. SARGENT. That is what I wanted to know. I shall vote with the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair submits the question to the Senate whether the amendment shall be received.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I ask in voting on this ought we to vote according to our view of the merits of the question, or on the ruling of the Chair?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair cannot advise Senators.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I want to understand this matter. Are we to vote on the merits? Here is a distinct rule and the Chair rules upon it. It seems to my mind that we should sustain the Chair; else there is no order in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has stated his opinion upon the wording of this amendment, that it is not in order. The rule, however, provides that the question of order may be submitted to the Senate. The rules are the rules of the Senate, not of the Chair. The Senate is unquestionably under obligation to enforce its rules as much as the Chair is. The Chair now submits the question to the Senate.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I only inquire for information; I do not wish to take up time. I do not make a point on this particular case because I am inclined to vote for this amendment, but as a question of precedent and as to the order of the Senate, my impression is that the questions which have been submitted to the Senate have been on propositions that have been germane to the subject at issue, but in other instances where there has been a question under this rule the amendment proposed did not come under the rule and has been ruled out of order. Such a case is not generally submitted to the Senate. While I am disposed to vote for the amendment and should like to vote for it, yet on the question of the construction of the rule I feel it to be my duty to be as strict as I feel the Senate ought to be toward any one who occupied the chair.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I understand the Chair to have decided that this motion is not in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has so decided.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I wish the Chair to put the question to the Senate whether the decision of the Chair should be sustained.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That cannot be done unless there is an appeal taken; but the Chair submitted the question to the Senate, which the Chair understands to be the same thing as an appeal; and every Senator, the Chair supposes, will vote on this question as he would decide upon it if he were in the chair.

Mr. MITCHELL. I hope the discussion on the point of order will not prejudice this vote. It is a precisely parallel case to some three amendments offered which have been submitted to the vote of the Senate on their reception.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senate ought not to insist that for the sake of getting in any proposition of this description we should violate the rules of the Senate.

Mr. MITCHELL. I only ask that the same rule be applied to this amendment that has been applied to two or three others within the last half-hour.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is a misconception. The Senate cannot, for the sake of putting upon this bill a claim which is excluded by the rules in the sense of the Chair, unless we believe that he has ruled incorrectly, overrule the Chair without overruling the rules of the Senate and demoralizing the body.

Mr. MITCHELL. I concede that this amendment is technically obnoxious to the rule. I am now appealing to the Senate, and ask that the same indulgence be extended to it as to others.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That can only be done by general consent.

Mr. STOCKTON. I desire to say in reference to this question of order that the Senate cannot by a majority vote suspend a rule of the Senate; and when the President ruled against the Senator from South Carolina in a former case and held that the amendment to which he objected could be put to the Senate, I thought the Chair was mistaken. Afterward I offered an amendment myself from a committee, with the hope and belief that it would be accepted, having given notice of it to the Committee on Appropriations. I made the same point and claimed from the Chair the decision which had been made in the matter objected to by the Senator from South Carolina.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair made precisely the same decision in both cases.

Mr. STOCKTON. Precisely. The President anticipates what I was going to say. He made precisely the same ruling, and I have no fault to find with the fact in making my point now that he was wrong in the first ruling. I then attempted, believing that I was right, to take advantage of the ruling of the Chair; the Chair then submitted that question to the Senate, and I called for the yeas and nays; but instantly perceiving, as I believed, that the Chair had been wrong in the first ruling, and that he was also wrong in the ruling that I had a right to ask the Senate to vote in reference to the construction of its own rules to adopt my amendment by a majority vote, I rose and withdrew the call for the yeas and nays.

I have felt it my duty before this question is put to the Senate to state that fact. My amendment was not a personal one; it was not a private claim in some senses. The matter had been before Congress so long, before the committees so frequently, and was so perfectly understood by the Committee on Appropriations, that I hoped and expected them to assent to it. They did not, however. I do not believe I had a right under the rule to force that appropriation on the bill even if I got a majority vote for it. My impression is that the President was wrong in his original ruling on the matter raised by the Senator from South Carolina, and that you cannot violate a deliberate rule of the Senate by a majority vote; and if you so decide you see what it comes to. There is not one of us that cannot get any private claim put on the sundry civil bill in spite of the rule by going around and getting one majority in the Senate. The object of the rule is to prevent that. The object of permanent rules is to control the majority in their action at the moment. I make my point very respectfully, and I only do it because I think I was wrong in asking the Chair to decide in my case as he had before decided in the case of the Senator from South Carolina.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The sixth rule, among other things, provides as follows:

> And every question of order shall be decided by the Presiding Officer, without debate, subject to an appeal to the Senate; and the Presiding Officer may call for the sense of the Senate on any question of order.

Upon the first question just referred to, at the suggestion of Senators, the Chair submitted it to the Senate, and the Senate passed upon the point of order. When the next question arose the Chair ruled the amendment out of order as he had the first. At the request of a Senator, however, he submitted the question to the Senate. The Senate ruled it out of order. The Senator from Oregon now submits an amendment, and the Chair has expressed his opinion upon it, but at the request of the Senator from Oregon he submits it to the Senate, and the Senate will declare whether they will enforce their rules or violate them.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. STOCKTON,] I am sure unintentionally, did injustice to the first decision of the Chair. I did not understand the Chair to decide that the motion which I made was in order except by unanimous consent, and when I made it I stated that it required unanimous consent, and I understood the Chair to put it to the Senate for a unanimous vote, and it was so decided. The Senator from South Carolina rose to an objection, but the question had been decided, and it was after unanimous consent had been given.

Mr. ROBERTSON. The Senator is mistaken; I did not do any such thing.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will now state to the President and to the Senate that unless the objection is withdrawn so that I have unanimous consent to offer the amendment, I shall not press it. I would appeal to the Senator from South Carolina.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the amendment?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I hope there will be none on that ground.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon now states that unless unanimous consent be given to offer this amendment he will withdraw it. Is that unanimous consent given?

Mr. ROBERTSON. I have objected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina still objects.

Mr. MITCHELL. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. STOCKTON. I desire to say in reply to the Senator from Rhode Island that that amendment to which he referred was not adopted by unanimous consent. He is mistaken, because we heard the Senator from South Carolina objecting at the time, and the question would not have been put to the Senate on the point of order if there had been unanimous consent. I desire to call attention to the fact that it was an amendment from no committee and it was an amendment that was offered without notice. My amendment I was authorized to offer; I gave notice of it four or five days ago and sent it to the Committee on Appropriations. The result is that one amendment is put on the bill by the decision of the Chair without unanimous consent and my amendment was ruled out. That was the reason I took advantage of the point of order made; but believing, as I said before, that the Chair was wrong in its first ruling, believing that the Senate could not violate its own rules by a majority vote, I preferred not to call for the yeas and nays or to insist on the call. I think the decision of the Chair in the first place was wrong.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey is laboring under a great misapprehension if he understood the Chair to intimate or express the opinion or to say that the Senate could violate its own rules. On the contrary, the Chair submitted to the Senate the question whether it would obey its own rules, and it decided according to its understanding of the rule.

Mr. STOCKTON. I deny the power of the Senate to decide that it will not obey its own rules. I make that point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will read to the Senator once more:

> And every question of order shall be decided by the Presiding Officer, without debate, subject to an appeal to the Senate; and the Presiding Officer may call for the sense of the Senate on any question of order.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I should like to ask one question here. Has it not been the practice of the Chair to submit a question before himself ruling on it? Where there has been a question of doubt, has it not then been the practice for the Chair to submit that question without previously ruling on the case? In this case the Chair has ruled in advance, and at the request of some Senators has submitted the question to the Senate. If the Senate reserved its right and exercises its power to overrule the Chair, I ask the Chair and the Senate how can we preserve order in the Senate?

Mr. ALCORN. Upon this question——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon which question?

Mr. ALCORN. The question just submitted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no question submitted. If there be no further amendment——

Mr. ALCORN. I have an amendment to offer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive it.

Mr. ALCORN. I offer the following amendment:

SEC. —. That the Secretary of War be, and he hereby is, authorized and required to order the Chief Engineer of the Army to cause to be made, without delay, such explorations, surveys, and drawings as may be sufficient to enable him to apply the sum of money herein appropriated in the most economical and practical form, so as to meet the demand for immediate and pressing relief to the levee districts in the States of Mississippi, Arkansas, and Louisiana, and close, as far as may be, all crevasses or broken sections of the levee in the districts named in the most sufficient and permanent manner possible under the circumstances, and so to apply the fund as to give relief to the largest agricultural areas, and thereby preserve the cotton and sugar districts from future disasters from the floods of the Mississippi River.

SEC —. That the said Secretary of War be authorized and empowered to negotiate and contract with the several levee boards, or with the riparian owners of the land, or with the governors of the States named, for that temporary jurisdiction necessary to the work, and for rights of way and cuts for dirt without cost to the United States, so as to avoid all conflicts of jurisdiction in a work undertaken by the national authority upon the urgent appeal of the people most directly interested, and by the Representatives of these States in Congress declared to be a task impossible of accomplishment by the States or people involved in the ruins wrought by the flood just now receding from the districts named. And the said Secretary shall, as far as is practicable, cause the work by him done to harmonize in its execution with the local laws governing the construction of the public levees, and to do all else that may be necessary and proper to execute the design of Congress and give all possible relief to the country. And should any conflicts arise or protests be made by the levee boards or land-owners along the line of said works touching the action of the engineer in charge, appeal may be made to the Secretary of War, whose decision shall be final.

SEC. —. That the work herein contemplated shall be held to extend to all levee work of whatever kind necessary to close broken sections of levee resulting from crevasse or otherwise, and to all repairs proper to old work which may be held necessary to the largest possible protection.

SEC. —. That the works herein contemplated shall be let out to contractors, and, as far as is possible with the economy of the case, employment shall be given to the sufferers by flood, that their calamity may be so ameliorated as to supply them with the opportunity of earning bread while contributing labor to a work for the protection of their farms is being done.

SEC. —. That the sum of $2,000,000 is hereby set apart in the Treasury, out of any money not otherwise appropriated, for the execution of the work contemplated in this act, subject to the order of the Chief Engineer of the Army, countersigned by the Secretary of War, and may, from time to time, be drawn in such sums as may be necessary for the purposes of this act; and the Secretary of War may, at his option, detail a paymaster from the Army, and place him in readiness to meet the necessary demands, so that contractors and employés may be promptly paid.

SEC. —. That one-half the appropriation herein made shall be expended in the district and within the State of Louisiana; and the remaining half shall be expended, one-half within the State of Mississippi and the other half within the State of Arkansas.

SEC. —. That the Secretary of War make a report to the next session of Congress, detailing the work done under this act, with such explanatory suggestions as may be proper to represent clearly his action in this behalf.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I hope my honorable friend has in some sense accomplished his object by having that read as a proposition which he thinks very desirable, and that therefore he will not think very unkindly if I raise a question of order upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine will state his point of order.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It is legislation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. STEWART. I offer an amendment to come in on page 24, line 572, after "$40,000."

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the portions of the Union Pacific Railroad and the Central Pacific Railroad, and their branches upon which trains have run during the last year, are hereby accepted as completed, within the meaning of the third section of the act approved July 1, 1862, entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes;" and patents shall issue for the lands granted in aid thereof as rapidly as the surveys of the United States are extended.

Mr. ANTHONY. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. STEWART. Why? I think this will be unanimously adopted.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is legislation.

Mr. STEWART. There is a bill on this same subject that has passed the House of Representatives.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have not charge of the bill.

Mr. STEWART. This relates to surveys, and that is in order I think. I hope the Senator will not object, but allow me a hearing.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will not object; but it is out of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As much of the amendment as has been read is clearly out of order.

Mr. STEWART. It has not been all read.

Mr. SARGENT. I would suggest to the Chair——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the amendment will be concluded.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. It was ruled not in order.

Mr. STEWART. I rise to a point of order. I have a right to have my amendment read that the Chair may see whether it is in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order and the reading will be concluded.

The Chief Clerk continued the reading of the amendment, as follows:

Provided, however, That nothing in this act shall be construed to relieve any railroad company from the effect of any forfeiture heretofore suffered or incurred.

Mr. HAGER. I object.

Mr. STEWART. I ask the indulgence of the Senate for one moment.

Mr. HAGER. I wish it understood that I object to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California raise the point of order?

Mr. HAGER. I make the point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California will state his point of order.

Mr. HAGER. That it is out of order at this time on this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to have the preceding clause to which it relates read, so that it may be understood.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator appeal from the decision?

Mr. STEWART. I appeal to the Chair to let the proposed clause be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator appeal from the Chair or to the Chair?

Mr. STEWART. I appeal to the Chair to allow that clause to be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will read the clause to which the amendment is sought to be attached. It is:

For surveying the public lands in Nevada, at rates not exceeding fifteen dollars per linear mile for standard lines, twelve dollars for township, and ten dollars for section lines, $40,000.

Mr. STEWART. Now allow me to explain this matter; and in order to have an opportunity to do so, I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, a brief reference to the legislation of Congress will show not only the propriety of this amendment, but that it is perfectly in order. It has reference to the surveying of the Government lands along the line of the railroad. The clause I seek to amend appropriates money to pay for such surveys, and my amendment provides for the patenting of the railroad lands as the surveys are extended, to the end that they may become taxable as other property. The third section of the act of July 1, 1862, to aid in the construction of the Pacific Railroad, declares that—

All such lands—

That is all lands granted to the road—

And all such lands, so granted by this section, which shall not be sold or disposed of by said company within three years after the entire road shall have been completed, shall be subject to settlement and pre-emption, like other lands, at a price not exceeding $1.25 per acre, to be paid to said company.

It will be seen that the lands after the three years from the time the road was completed were to be open to settlement. By the act of July 2, 1864, in the twenty-first section, it is provided:

SEC. 21. And be it further enacted, That before any land granted by this act shall be conveyed to any company or party entitled thereto under this act, there shall first be paid into the Treasury of the United States the cost of surveying, selecting, and conveying the same by the said company or party in interest as the titles shall be required by said company, which amount shall, without any further appropriation, stand to the credit of the proper account, to be used by the Commissioner of the General Land Office for the prosecution of the survey of the public lands along the line of said roads, and so from year to year until the whole shall be completed, as provided under the provisions of this act.

By this section, whenever the company want lands they may make the advance and have them surveyed. The language is, "as the titles shall be required by said company." There is nothing in the act compelling them to pay the cost of survey and take out patents. They are to do this only when they require the titles. In 1869 Congress passed another act, the second section of which reads as follows:

SEC. 2. And be it further resolved, That, to ascertain the condition of the Union Pacific Railroad and the Central Pacific Railroad, the President of the United States is authorized to appoint a board of eminent citizens, not exceeding five in number, and who shall not be interested in either road, to examine and report upon the condition of and what sum or sums, if any, will be required to complete each of said roads, for the entire length thereof, to the said terminus as a first-class railroad, in compliance with the several acts relating to said roads; and the expense of such board, including an allowance of ten dollars to each for their services for each day employed in such examination or report, to be paid equally by said companies.

This commission made their examination, and on the 30th of October, 1869, reported that it would require an expenditure of $576,650 to complete the Central Pacific Railroad, and $1,586,100 to complete the Union Pacific Railroad; whereupon Mr. Secretary Cox entered an order withholding one-half of the lands granted until the roads were completed. The following letter from Secretary Delano will shed additional light upon this point:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, D. C., June 17, 1874.

SIR: I have carefully examined the bill (H. R. No. 3281) to amend the Pacific railroad act of 2d July, 1864, transmitted with your letter of the 9th instant, with request that I give your committee my views thereon and make any suggestions that I may see fit as to legislation on the subject.

A joint resolution was approved April 10, 1869, (16 Statutes, 56) "for the protection of the interests of the United States in the Union Pacific Railroad Company, the Central Pacific Railroad Company, and for other purposes." Under the second section of said resolution the President appointed five "eminent citizens" to examine and report upon the condition of said companies' roads. They made the examination, and on the 30th October, 1869, submitted their report, (copy herewith.) Their estimate for supplying deficiencies in the Central Pacific road was $576,650, and in the Union Pacific road $1,586,100.

To secure the completion of the roads in the matters reported deficient, Mr. Secretary Cox, on the 3d November, 1869, directed the Commissioner of the General Land Office to suspend the issue of one-half the patents for lands granted to said companies. That these deficiencies have been supplied the Executive has had no official information. Mr. Cox's order is therefore still in force, and should in my judgment continue in force until such official information is received. I should long ago have appointed commissioners to re-examine said roads had there been any fund at my command out of which they could have been compensated for their services. Only recently the president of the Union Pacific Company applied for the appointment of commissioners to make such re-examination of their road, but no such application has been made by the Central Pacific Company.

The subsidy in bonds granted said companies has long since been received in full by them, so that this moiety of lands withheld is the only security of the Government for the completion of the road as required by law.

The clause of said bill beginning on the twenty-seventh line of the second page directs "the Commissioner of the General Land Office to prepare and deliver without delay patents for all lands applied for by any company as aforesaid, where the same are clearly within the grant and free from conflicting claims," &c. As this clause would ipso facto repeal said order of Mr. Cox, I respectfully suggest that it be so changed as to make the mandatory order to the Commissioner contingent on the executors being satisfied that all the deficiencies reported by said "eminent citizens" have been supplied, and that the roads are completed as required by law.

This is the only suggestion that I have to make concerning the bill.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

C. DELANO,
Secretary.

Hon. W. M. STEWART,
Chairman Committee on Railroads, United States Senate.

Under the act of 1864, as we have seen, it was provided that when the railroad companies "required" the lands they might make the advance for surveys and receive patents. They declined to make this advance, because they did not care for the patents; and then, under the act of 1869, lands were withheld by the Department to secure the completion of the roads.

If the roads had been accepted as completed when trains first commenced running through, in 1869, the companies would have been compelled to make the advance for surveys and take their patents, for in default thereof the three years after which they were to be subject to pre-emption at $1.25 an acre would have expired in 1872. In other words, the companies would have been forced to decide whether they would take their patents before 1872 and sell their lands at good prices, or leave them unpatented and subject to entry and sale like Government lands, at the minimum price of $1.25 an acre.

The bill that passed the House at this session aimed at a remedy for the injustice of allowing these granted lands to remain unpatented and therefore exempt from local taxation. This was right, and I have sought to secure the remedies it proposes, and at the same time to secure the rights of settlers to the benefit intended by the third section of the act of 1862, already cited. There is nothing in the amendment proposed but a declaration that the roads are completed for the purposes of that section, to the end that the three years may commence to run. This never should have been interrupted. The withholding of the lands from the companies under the authority of the resolution of 1869 creating the commission to examine the roads, taken together with the action of two Secretaries of the Interior, has already postponed for five years the time when the lands granted in aid of these roads are to become subject to pre-emption as other public lands. This amendment proposes to put an end to that delay.

It also provides that patents shall issue as rapidly as the surveys are extended. This would require patents to issue immediately for several million acres of land already surveyed, and would in a short time make all granted lands along the line of these roads available for local taxation. The House bill is defective in that it does not declare the roads completed. The Government in granting the lands in the first instance reserved control of the manner of their disposition for all time except the three years next succeeding the completion of the road. This valuable reservation was to guard against the creation of a great land monopoly. It is defeated so long as the roads are declared by the Government to be incomplete. Congress should not allow these lands to be taxed away by the States, or to enable purchasers under tax sales to monopolize them as against settlers. This is the view taken by the Commissioner of the General Land Office in his letter to the Secretary of the Interior of the 13th instant. Alluding to the House bill he says:

The bill now before me seems to be sufficient to cover the case so far as respects the requirements of the twenty-first section of the act of 1864, and embodies substantially the views expressed by this office in the foregoing communications.

It still leaves untouched, however, the proviso to the third section of the act of July 1, 1862, referred to in the letter from this office to Mr. Kendall, and therefore, in my judgment, fails to remove one of the principal reasons which, according to the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of the Kansas Pacific Railway vs. John H. Prescott, "forbid the State to embarrass these rights (of the Government) by a sale for taxes."

The following is the decision of the Supreme Court referred to by the Commissioner:

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Nos. 388 and 389.—December term, 1872.

In error to the supreme court of the State of Kansas.

The Kansas Pacific Railway Company, plaintiff in error, vs. John H. Prescott; and same vs. Charles C. Culp.

Mr. Justice MILLER delivered the opinion of the court:

This writ of error to the supreme court of the State of Kansas brings before us a record involving the right of that State to tax, under certain circumstances, the land granted by Congress to this company to aid in the construction of their road.

The case was heard in the State courts on an agreed statement of facts which presents the simple question whether the land was subject, in the year 1868, to State taxation. It was contended by plaintiff in error that, under certain provisions of the acts granting this land, it was not.

The statute which gave alternate sections of land on each side of said road, within certain limits, provided that a patent should issue to the company only as each section of forty miles in length should be completed and accepted by the President. It also contained a provision that any of these lands not sold by the company within three years after the final completion of the road should be liable to be sold to actual settlers under the pre-emption laws, at $1.25 per acre, the money to be paid to the company.

The original act of 1862 was amended in 1864 by extending the limits of the grant on each side of the road, and by several other provisions favorable to the company. But by the twenty-first section of the amendatory statute it was declared that before any of the lands granted by the act should be conveyed to the company, the cost of surveying, selecting, and conveying such lands should first be paid into the Treasury of the United States by the company or party in interest, which amount should stand as a fund for the prosecution of the surveys of the public lands along the line of the road until the whole should be completed.

A question is raised whether the latter provision requires this prepayment of the cost of surveying for the lands granted by the original act, or is limited to the lands acquired by the extension of the grant. Looking to the whole scope of the amended act, and to the provision that the money so paid was to constitute a fund for the continuance and completion of the entire surveys along the road where none had been made, we are of opinion that no patent could rightfully issue in any case until the cost of survey had been paid. None of the road had been built when the amendatory act was passed. No right had vested in any tracts of land, and the power, as well as intent, of Congress to require such payment cannot be contested.

While we recognize the doctrine heretofore laid down by this court, that lands sold by the United States may be taxed before they have parted with the legal title by issuing a patent, it is to be understood as applicable to cases where the right to the patent is complete, and the equitable title is fully vested in the party without anything more to be paid or any act to be done going to the foundation of his right.

The present case does not fall within that principle.

Two important acts remain to be done, the failure to do which may wholly defeat the right of the company to a patent for these lands.

1. The first is the payment of the costs of surveying. It is admitted that this has never been done in the present case. If the company have such an interest in these lands that they can be sold by the State under her power of taxation, then the title is divested out of the Government without its consent, and the right to recover the money expended in the surveys is defeated.

As the Government retains the legal title until the company or some one interested in the same grant or title shall pay these expenses, the State cannot levy taxes on the land, and under such levy sell and make a title which might in any event defeat this right of the Federal Government reserved in the act by which the inchoate grant was made.

2. Another important and declared purpose of Congress would be equally defeated by the title thus acquired under the tax sale, if it were valid.

It is wisely provided that these lands shall not be used by the company as a monopoly of indefinite duration. The policy of the Government has been for years to encourage settlement on the public lands by the pioneers of emigration, and to this end it has passed many laws for their benefit. This policy not only favors the actual settler, but is to the interest of those who, by purchase, own adjacent lands, that all of it should be open to settlement and cultivation.

Looking to this policy, and to the very large quantity of lands granted by this statute to a single corporation, Congress declared that if the company did not sell those lands within a time limited by the act, they should then, without further action of the company or of Congress, be open to the actual settler under the same laws which govern the right of pre-emption on Government lands, and at the same price. Any one who has ever lived in a community where large bodies of land are withheld from use or occupation, or from sale except at exorbitant prices, will recognize the value of this provision. It is made for the public good as well as for that of the actual settler.

To permit these lands to pass under a title derived from the State for taxes would certainly defeat this intent of Congress. It makes no difference in the force of the principle that the money paid by the settler goes to the company. The lands which the act of Congress declares shall be open to pre-emption and sale are withdrawn from pre-emption and sale by a tax title and possession under it, and it is no answer to say that the company which might have paid the taxes gets the price paid by the settler.

For these reasons we think that though the line of the road had been built, and approved by the President, so far as to authorize the company to obtain a patent for this land, if they had paid the cost of survey and the expenses of making the conveyance, yet the neglect to do this and the contingent right of offering the land to actual settlers at the minimum price asked for its lands by the Government, forbid the State to embarrass these rights by a sale for taxes.

The judgment of the State court is therefore reversed, and the case remanded with instructions to proceed in conformity with this opinion.

The same judgment must follow in the case of the same plaintiff vs. Culp which falls within the principles here stated.

To hasten the time when the great grants of land to railroads may be open to settlement at the minimum price of $1.25 an acre, and that meanwhile all such lands may be subject to taxation, it is necessary that this amendment should be adopted. It is legislation, but it is germane to the subject-matter of the appropriation provided for in the clause I seek to amend. I trust it may be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. SPRAGUE. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island moves to lay the appeal on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The question being on the third reading of this bill, I ask to have read a report made by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] from the Committee on Indian Affairs on the 16th of May, 1872, relating to this Langford claim, which is in this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred Senate bill No. 744 for the relief of William G. Langford, respectfully report:

That the claim of Langford, as assignee of the Commissioners of the American Board of Foreign Missions, to the tract of land which forms the subject-matter of this bill, is based upon the act of August 14, 1848, entitled "An act to establish the territorial government of Oregon," (Statutes at Large, volume 9, page 323,) and upon a provision of the act of March 2, 1853, entitled "An act to establish the territorial government of Washington," (Statutes at Large, volume 10, page 173.) The first-named act provides "that the title to the land, not exceeding six hundred and forty acres, now occupied as missionary stations among the Indian tribes in said Territory, together with the improvements thereon, be confirmed and established in the several religious societies to which said missionary stations respectively belong." From a statement made by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, the missionaries of the said board of missions abandoned the tract in question on the 4th December, 1847, and between that date and 2d of May, 1862, made no demonstration of returning to occupy the same, but were in the intermediate period engaged elsewhere, the tract remaining, during the first eight years of that period, unoccupied and unclaimed, except under the general Indian title to that section of the country. As the act of August 14, 1848, required present occupation for missionary purposes as a condition to the grant, the board, having left the tract prior to that date, would appear to have no claim to the land under that act. The act of March 2, 1853, however, provides "that the title to the land, not exceeding six hundred and forty acres, now occupied as missionary stations among the Indian tribes in said Territory, or that may have been so occupied as missionary stations prior to the passage of the act establishing the territorial government of Oregon, together with the improvements thereon, be, and is hereby, confirmed and established to the several religious societies to which said missionary stations respectively belong." While it is not probable that Congress intended by this act, to convey to any religious society lands once held by them as a missionary station, but which had been abandoned by them over five years before, it would appear that a technical title is conveyed by the provision quoted.

It is stated by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs that on the 2d of May, 1862, the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions notified Agent Hutchins, of the Lapwai Indian agency, that the board claimed, under the foregoing provisions of law, the tract of land described in Senate bill 744, being the land upon which said agency was then and is now located, and which is now claimed by Langford as the assignee of said board. In February, 1868, Langdon S. Ward, treasurer of said board, executed a deed of conveyance of the said tract of land to the said Langford, for a consideration named of $500. Suit was commenced by the said Langford, in the district court of Idaho, against the Indian agent, for the possession of the property, and judgment by default was entered in his favor October 9, 1869. These facts having been submitted to the Secretary of the Interior, that official instructed the Indian Bureau that "the land claimed by the mission board, being within the diminished reserve of the Nez Percé Indians, and never having been relinquished by said Indians, will be retained for their agency purposes." Langford applies to Congress for relief. If the treaty of June 11, 1855, with the Nez Percé Indians, by inadvertence wrested from the mission board, or its assignee, rights vested in it by the act of 1853, the claimant, if the legal assignee of the mission board, is entitled to relief, but not to the extent of the sum named in Senate bill 744. The consideration actually paid by him to the mission board for the assignment of their claim would seem to afford an equitable measure for the degree of relief to be afforded; and in accordance with this view the committee recommend the passage of the accompanying substitute for the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not intend to delay the passage of this bill by any extended observations; but I think it due to the cause of truth and justice that this unanimous report of the Committee on Indian Affairs, made two years ago upon the subject of this claim, should be read, by which you have the authoritative statement of this committee that this claim in the first place had no foundation in law, that possibly by a later act, in the second place, there may have been a technical and inadvertent title confirmed in this Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, they having by the very act confirming the title no power of alienation at all. This speculator bought for $500 the title of these missionary people, or their chance. He then brought an action against the Indian agent, as if he represented the United States, and the Indian agent conveniently did not appear, and the claimant took a judgment by default, which is the judicial determination of the district court of that Territory against the right of the United States! This committee say that if this man has any equity at all, as he plainly has no legal power to enforce his rights against the United States, it is equity to reclaim his $500 that he paid and no more. In two years, on the report of the Committee on Appropriations, $500 has grown to $15,000! I do not know but that it is best to pass it in this shape. Perhaps there is no help for it now in either case; for in the same ratio if we were to put it off until another year it would grow to $25,000, and so on.

I only call the attention of the Senate to this formal, authoritative, and unanimous report of the Committee on Indian Affairs of two years ago to show that this profound swindle, as this paper shows it to be, of this claimant, and for which the Committee on Indian Affairs only proposed to pay a return of the consideration that this speculator gave of $500, has now grown so that the Treasury of the United States is to be taxed $15,000 to pay this speculator for his chances against the Government of the United States.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I submit a motion to reconsider the vote by which that amendment was adopted. It is on page 20.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no right to submit that motion myself, for the reason that I voted against the amendment; but I thought it due to truth and justice to give you the authoritative report of the Committee on Indian Affairs on the subject of this claim.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island moves to reconsider the vote by which the Senate concurred in the amendment in Committee of the Whole in regard to this claim.

Mr. BOGY. The report read by the Secretary was before the Committee on Indian Affairs, and was carefully investigated. Many of the facts, stated as facts in the report made two years ago, upon a laborious investigation were found not to be correct, and that report itself admits that the owners of this land, whether Mr. Langford or anybody else, have title, whether they paid $500 or more or less. The man is entitled to compensation for his loss, or nothing at all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It does not admit that he has any title.

Mr. BOGY. Then why give him $500? If he is entitled to $500 you admit the title in him. He had a title both under the law of 1848 and under the law of 1853. The title has been recognized by the Government of the United States; the land has been surveyed and the survey has been approved as a part of the official surveys of the United States.

Mr. KELLY. As there has been an intimation that there has been swindling going on in this matter, I wish to state, and I may require possibly more than five minutes if it is allowed me, the grounds of this title.

When the Territory of Oregon was organized on the 14th of August, 1848, it was deemed proper to provide for the missionary stations that had been located there many years before. On a certain day in November, 1847, a few months preceding, the Whitman massacre took place, when the missionaries, these among others, were driven from their location. They were not in possession technically on the 14th of August, 1848, on account of the insurrection in the Indian country. All the whites were driven out. Hence it became necessary to secure the title beyond question; and when Washington Territory was organized it was provided—

> That the title to land, not exceeding six hundred and forty acres, now occupied as missionary stations among the Indian tribes in the said Territory, or that may have been so occupied as missionary stations prior to the passage of the act establishing the territorial government of Oregon, with the improvements thereon, be, and the same is hereby, confirmed to the several religious societies to which the said missionary stations severally belong.

That was a confirmation of the title to any missionary station that had been located at any time prior to the 14th of August, 1848. That secured a confirmation of the title. There have been many titles in Washington Territory and in Oregon confirmed to the several religious societies there, and this, among others, is as perfect as any one there. It was settled in 1836. That missionary society christianized the Nez Percés. There was the first printing establishment set up on the Pacific coast. There certain hymns were published in the Nez Percé tongue, and a part of the New Testament was translated for their benefit. That tribe, above all others, is the one that has never shed a drop of white blood. Their civilization commenced by that missionary society, and for that reason Congress thought in that day that it was necessary to reward these faithful men.

The society, not desiring to get into litigation with the United States, transferred the land to Mr. Langford for the nominal consideration of $500 and other services that he had rendered the society. There is no question but what the title is perfect in him. Mr. Langford desires either the possession of his premises or payment for them; and I may here say, if it is proper for me to refer to what a House bill contains, that the House committee propose to leave it to the courts to decide what was the value of the premises. That is perfectly satisfactory to Mr. Langford; or he is satisfied to have the United States appoint one person and let him select another, the two to select a third, and ascertain by arbitration what the value is. Not only that, but he is perfectly willing to let the United States take all its property off his land and give him simply the land and what is a reasonable amount for the use and occupation of it. Either will satisfy him; but he thinks it proper when he has the title to the land, and the United States have put $66,000 worth of improvements on the land, that they should either give him his land or pay him what it is worth.

So far as the value is concerned, I have affidavits (and they were before the committee) from various men swearing from fifteen thousand up to forty thousand dollars as the value of these premises, independent, too, some say, of the improvements placed on them by the United States.

It may be said that because the committee two years ago found that $1,500 was the value, therefore Mr. Langford was bound to accept it. He did not prosecute that case in the other branch of Congress. When that committee made the report he let it go; he would have nothing to do with it; he would not accept it, and I presume no man can force him to give up his land even to the United States for $1,500 if he estimates it as of greater value. He does estimate it at the sum I have stated. The committee found that that was its value after full and fair investigation.

This is all I have to say about it. It seems to me that it ill becomes the United States to hold possession of his land——

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The Senator has spoken five minutes.

Mr. ALCORN. When this question was being discussed upon the amendment offered by the Committee on Appropriations, I was well satisfied of the injustice of this demand, and while I think the country owes an obligation to the honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] for bringing forward indisputable evidence of the fact that this is an attempt to wrong the Government out of the sum of $15,000, it does not in any degree weaken the judgment that I formed when the question was under discussion.

It was said in the discussion of this section that this party had a judgment against the Government of the United States, a judgment of ouster for this land. It turns out now that the party brought a suit against the Indian agent, and that the Indian agent permitted a judgment by default to be entered against him. Of this the evidence stands here unmistakable, so that there was collusion between this man and the Indian agent from the beginning of this transaction down to the time when this judgment was rendered, and I have no doubt in my mind, without knowing the fact to be so, that whatever may have been recovered from the Government upon this claim would have been divided between the party and the agent.

It was argued here awhile ago that this man could bring an ejectment against the Government of the United States and recover all these buildings and take them unto himself. Is there a lawyer here who will attempt to enforce the idea before the Senate that this party could sue the Government, even though his title was ever so good, and recover a title against the Government, and then take to himself, without any remuneration to the Government, the buildings it had erected upon this land, he standing there and permitting the buildings to be erected, he in collusion with the agent all the while, he standing by and waiting his opportunity to come forward and make this demand of the Government of the United States that he might make $15,000 off an investment upon its face of $500; and how much he paid no one knows? I doubt, looking at this transaction, regarding it from beginning to end as a fraud, whether in truth and in fact he paid anything.

Mr. KELLY. Will the Senator allow me to correct him?

Mr. ALCORN. Certainly?

Mr. KELLY. I have not here the record of the judgment obtained, but I know this is the substance of it; it may be among the papers in the possession of the committee. There was not technically judgment by default. There was a demurrer interposed. Suit was brought and service was made upon the Indian agent as the person in possession. He employed or spoke to the district attorney, who filed a demurrer. The demurrer was held over by the court for one or two terms, and then overruled. Application was afterward made to file an answer, I think; I do not know whether leave was given or not; but no answer was filed and judgment was entered upon the demurrer. If that was default, then there was default.

Mr. ALCORN. Well, Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Have I any time left?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is not aware that the Senator has spoken before on this question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Lest I should violate the rule of the Senate I move to postpone this bill indefinitely. I believe there is not any limit to debate on a motion to postpone indefinitely. I do not intend to weary the Senate.

Mr. OGLESBY. Is there not a motion pending to reconsider?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suppose there is; I take it a motion to postpone indefinitely overrules that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Vermont is in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think it will be difficult, Mr. President, for Senators to avoid finding out what the truth is, if you can believe the unanimous report of the Committee on Indian Affairs as made by the Senator from New Jersey, and then say afterward that they voted in ignorance. That is all I have to do with it.

Now, Mr. President, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. KELLY] says that this was not a judgment by default. He has not the papers here to show it. I assume that he was not the counsel, and that he is acting on information. A responsible committee of this body reports that it was a judgment by default. I leave it to the Senate to determine which is most likely to be right in its opinion.

Secondly, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to what is also stated in this report, that when the circumstances were made known to the Secretary of the Interior, that official—and I now read from the report—

That official instructed the Indian Bureau that "the land claimed by the mission board, being within the diminished reserve of the Nez Percé Indians, and never having been relinquished by said Indians, will be retained for their agency purposes."

The responsible Department of the Government therefore repudiated this claim as having no lawful foundation to stand upon, and asserted the right of the United States to occupy these Indian lands with the consent of the Indians for the purposes of the Indians themselves. I put it to the honorable chairman of this committee, who I know will agree with me upon this subject, that these Indians had a title to these lands which the United States could not lawfully or rightfully dispose of without their consent to anybody; and that the Department of the Government charged with the administration of Indian and other interior affairs acted upon that principle, and held that this board of commissioners, to which Congress had undertaken to make a confirmation of these lands, had no title to them as against the Indians; and that the reservation, it being within the reservation all the time, was entitled to cover it. Then this man, knowing that he had no right in law, applied to Congress for relief.

That was the state of the case, and upon that application for relief the Committee on Indian Affairs two years ago unanimously report that all this man is entitled to, if he is entitled to anything, is the money that he paid for this speculative transaction, to wit, $500. And, Mr. President, instead of conceding, as the Senator from Oregon says, that this man had a title, the Senator from New Jersey, acting for this committee with the learning and caution that characterize him, says: "If the treaty of June 11, 1855, with the Nez Percé Indians, by inadvertence wrested from the mission board, or its assignee, rights vested in it by the act of 1853, the claimant, if the legal assignee of the mission board, is entitled to $500," as a matter of justice, in throwing up a bargain that he had no right to make. Therefore the Committee on Indian Affairs did not recognize this title. They well understood then, and unanimously understood then, that a confirmation to this corporation, without the act stating that it was to its successors and assigns, did not confer a title upon the corporation that it could convey to anybody else; and every lawyer within the sound of my voice understands as well as I do that that is the law. In order to confer a title on a corporation that it may convey, you must state in the statute or in the deed that carries that title that you convey to that corporation, "its successors and assigns." This act of Congress contained no such words. It was not intended that any such right should be granted. These lands were not granted to this corporation for the purposes of speculation and sale; they were granted to this corporation for the purpose of use for their religious objects in improving the condition of these Indians; and therefore the act of Congress, instead of saying that their successors and assigns might have these lands ever, said we confirmed to this Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions the title to these lands; and then it turns out, even upon that point, on the report of this committee, as the truth and the law was, that the Indian title not having been extinguished, all this confirmation was still subject to the paramount and superior and original right of the Indians to hold and possess this land for the purposes of their reservation.

There is the truth and there is the law about it; and yet in the face of all this this man comes forward and taking advantage of the convenient opportunity of riding a claim that could not stand otherwise, on an appropriation bill, gets $15,000 for his $500. I submit, because I know how much in haste the Senate is, that we ought to agree to the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island and take this out of this bill and let it be considered by itself.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Let us have the vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the indefinite postponement of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I withdraw that motion.

Mr. OGLESBY. Mr. President, I am not disposed to sit silently by and hear the Senator from Mississippi and the Senator from Vermont throw calumny and insinuation upon a man who in character can establish himself before this Senate to be the equal of any man in fair standing in the community. He came before the Indian Committee as an honest man. He stood there with a bill sent down by the Secretary of the Interior asking Congress to recognize his title or to create a court by which his title could be tried; and Mr. Langford asked our committee to pass that bill that the Secretary of the Interior recommended. The chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs introduced the bill into the Senate; it was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs to create a tribunal to determine his rights, thereby recognizing the rights of this man Langford to this property. He is the just and honest owner of it to-day. Now after this Indian Committee have treated with him and persuaded him to consent to take $15,000 and after the provision has fairly passed in this body, a report is brought in made by an Indian Committee two years ago which report Mr. Langford refused to accept.

What was the amount he asked for his claim then? Forty thousand dollars as I am told by the Senator from Vermont; for that I take his statement. He came here asking for his rights to this property. He says to the Government, "Take your property off; I do not want it; remove these buildings; let me have my ground;" and the Government stands stock-still and refuses to remove them, keeps this man out of his just rights, and drives him away—this man who was there for years and years, ten or fifteen years in that country, and stood among these Indians with that missionary society, and in consideration of his services to the missionasy association as much as for his $500 they gave him the title to this ground. Ask about the man's character! Is he to be maligned by innuendo here as a fraud, and is the Committee on Indian Affairs to be included in the insinuation simply because a man can stand here as a Senator and the man outside cannot reply? I will reply for him, and I resent the imputation—there is no justification for it—that this man has tried to defraud the Government out of a dollar.

Mr. MITCHELL. I should like in the same line with the argument of the Senator from Illinois to inquire of him whether Mr. Langford did not propose originally to submit this whole question as to the amount that he should receive for this claim to a jury of his countrymen?

Mr. OGLESBY. Undoubtedly. The Indian Committee reported a bill to this body—and I had it in my hands an hour or two ago—against the wishes of Mr. Langford, and it is only this last week or two that he consented to accept the $15,000 rather than be put to long delay and greater expense, and in addition to that to be insulted in this body where he cannot reply, he being a man of unimpeachable character, because he comes and makes a claim upon the Government. It is an easy thing to rise here and throw imputations and slurs and slander upon a man's character who cannot answer for himself. The eyes and ears of Senators are opened; they are alarmed, and by loud shouts of "fraud," "fraud," "fraud" they are terrified and Senators move to reconsider. You drive a man from his possessions, hold them yourselves, neither give him his property nor give him compensation!

An official document from the Secretary of the Interior, as the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BUCKINGHAM] will state, was sent to us with the form of a bill to create a board for the purpose of determining its title to this land. The committee took it up and thought the Government would be on safer ground, far safer ground than to transmit it back there with the character of affidavits we had to read as to this man's title as to what he could show before a jury of his countrymen.

Now, if the Senate will consider this matter, I have only one word more to say. It does not concern me except as I have respect and feeling for the man. I say if the Senate now reconsiders its vote and puts this item out of the bill and out of the body, the chickens will come back to roost again. That man is not going to be pursued and not defend his rights. The best thing the Government can now do is to liquidate this claim, take the title, pay the $15,000, and end the thing. If you do not it will linger in these Halls for years perhaps and end in a big bill of damages ultimately.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask a question? I ask the Senator if he will be kind enough to just allow the communication from the Secretary of the Interior that he speaks of so much to be read, so that we can know what it does say?

Mr. OGLESBY. Am I mistaken about that, I ask the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. There was such a communication.

Mr. OGLESBY. And the Secretary of the Interior sent the draught of a bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us see the evidence of it.

Mr. OGLESBY. I do not happen to have it here. I was instructed to report the bill back and did report it back with the letter, and I asked the Senate to pass that bill and I offered to take it up, but the Senator from California objected and it could not come up. There is no fraud in the matter at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's five minutes have expired. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SARGENT, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE.] If he were here he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Boreman, Boutwell, Carpenter, Chandler, Dennis, Edmunds, Fenton, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Merrimon, Morrill of Vermont, Robertson, Saulsbury, Schurz, Scott, Sprague, Stewart, Wadleigh, Washburn, and Wright—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Bogy, Buckingham, Clayton, Conover, Cragin, Davis, Flanagan, Gilbert, Harvey, Johnston, Kelly, McCreery, Mitchell, Norwood, Oglesby, Pease, Pratt, Ransom, Spencer, and Tipton—20.

ABSENT—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bayard, Brownlow, Cameron, Conkling, Cooper, Dorsey, Ferry of Connecticut, Gordon, Howe, Jones, Lewis, Logan, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Patterson, Ramsey, Sargent, Sherman, Stevenson, Stockton, Thurman, West, and Windom—25.

So the motion to reconsider was agreed to; and the question recurred on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole inserting after line 471:

For the purchase for an Indian agency station, the six hundred and forty acres of land situated on Lapwai Creek and Clearwater River, Idaho Territory, heretofore granted to the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, $15,000:

Provided, That no part of this sum shall be paid until a perfect title to the said land shall be made to the United States by a warranty deed, to be approved by the Attorney-General.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Although that is an amendment of the committee, I raise the point of order on it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is no need of raising that. The Senate has determined against it. We can dispose of it in a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order will be stated.

Mr. SPRAGUE. That being to provide for a private claim, the amendment is not in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks it is too late to raise the point of order now. The Senate has voted on it and voted it in. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SARGENT. On behalf of the Committee on Appropriations I ask that the following order be made:

Ordered, That the sundry civil appropriation bill be printed with the Senate amendments numbered consecutively.

This is to accommodate the House.

The order was adopted.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SARGENT submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3030) making appropriations to supply deficiences in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1873 and 1874, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the House to the amendment numbered 42, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 18, and agree to the same, as follows, namely: Substitute for the words stricken out the following:

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from their amendment numbered 30, with an amendment as follows: Add after the word "Congress" at the close of the paragraph these words: "And the unexpended balance of the appropriation for wrapping-paper provided for in the act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1874, is hereby made available for the purchase of wrapping-paper and twine;" and the House agree to the same.

A. A. SARGENT,
LOT M. MORRILL,
JAMES K. KELLY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JAMES A. GARFIELD,
EUGENE HALE,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

THE CONGRESSIONAL PRINTER.

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask the attention of the Senate to a report which I rise to make.

The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the letter of "F. & J. Rives & Geo. A. Bailey, proprietors of the Globe," charging the Congressional Printer with being a defaulter to the Government of the United States in his paper account and with other malfeasance in office, have had the same under consideration and have instructed me to make a written report. I should like, as the Congressional Printer is an officer of the Senate, to make some remarks pertinent to this matter, but at this late stage of the session I will not do so. I will merely say that the committee have unanimously acquitted the Congressional Printer of the charges, and that the closing sentence of the report, which is signed by all the members of the committee, is in these words:

In conclusion, the committee find nothing whatever in the evidence that impeaches the integrity of the Congressional Printer.

I move that the report be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 3773) to further define and enlarge the powers and duties of the board of health of the District of Columbia; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 115) for the relief of certain clerks and employés of the United States.

The message also announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution authorizing the Clerk of the House in enrolling the seventh Senate amendment to the bill making appropriations for the payment of claims reported by the commissioners of claims, &c., to insert the words "seven thousand five hundred and forty-five," being the sum awarded to the party named in said amendment, and which was omitted from the Senate amendment as engrossed and sent to the House.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the river and harbor bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3168) making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the five-minute rule be applied to this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 15 the Committee on Commerce proposed to strike out in line 319 the words "for examinations and surveys of rivers and harbors and;" and in line 321 to strike out "seventy" and insert "twenty;" so that the clause would read:

For incidental repairs at harbors for which there is no special appropriation, $25,000.

Mr. CHANDLER. I shall not resist non-concurrence with the amendment of the committee but ask that there be a vote.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Commerce was to strike out section 2.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will not insist upon that amendment either.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have some amendments from the committee which are not printed with the bill. I move on page 14 after line 3 of section 2 to insert:

Harbor of New Bedford, Massachusetts.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. I think if the bill is to pass it would be very much better not to make the inequality which now exists in the bill any more striking. This bill is a most extraordinary one, and finds its parallel only in one or two other river and harbor bills which before this time have passed Congress. The California delegation urged very strongly upon the committee of the House to pay some attention, some degree of respect to the recommendations of the War Department and Engineer Corps and to the estimates which were sent in, plainly and clearly showing the necessity of an improvement of Oakland Harbor. California is the third State in the Union for the extent of its sea-coast. They gave us for that whole extent of sea-coast $25,000 for an item that we do not care one snap about, and have overlooked a harbor through which passes annually two and a half million passengers, through which passes annually $70,000,000 of treasure, through which pass annually hundreds and hundreds of tons of freight, besides an enormous quantity of wheat; and for a harbor so situated, notwithstanding the recommendation of the Engineer Corps and of the War Department, we could not get the ear of the committee because they were so engaged in admiring every little saw-mill creek in Wisconsin or Michigan that they had no ear for anything that was farther off.

I hold in my hand this bill, numbering by the score almost appropriations for little harbors and little creeks scattered all through a little knot of States that seem to have the control of the committees charged with this bill. I find that some other States are recognized occasionally. I suppose it is perfectly proper that in the great State of New York the Great Sodus Bay should have $15,000. When I read the bill, I supposed the adjective "great" entitled them to that; but on looking immediately below I found that Little Sodus Bay in New York has $15,000 also; so that whether it is "great" or whether it is "little," anywhere in New York or anywhere in Wisconsin or anywhere where there are a good many votes to support a river and harbor bill, there is an opportunity for the demands of the Department and for the demands of the commerce of the country to be heard. But when it comes to a great improvement like that for which I speak, which is absolutely necessary to a commerce now carried on under the greatest difficulties, then it cannot be heard!

There was another amendment proposed by my colleague for San Diego Harbor. As it was shown to this committee, it was plain that the river had burst its bounds this last season under the exigencies of the floods, so that that which formerly ran into False Bay had forced its way into San Diego Harbor, so that the second best harbor on the coast, almost the only one outside of San Francisco which is safe for large fleets, was filled up by mud and sediment carried down that river, was rapidly filling up from headland to headland; and it was known that in a year or two it would be so filled up that this magnificent harbor would be entirely obliterated. Could we get the ear of the Senator from Michigan to that for one moment? Notwithstanding that the department themselves had made the surveys, had recognized this exigency and had called the attention of Congress to it, no more could we get the attention of the chairman of the committee of the other House and his committee there, but when it was called to their attention it was passed aside; and we were told, "O, no; we are not going to do any new work." That is what we are told, "no new work," although nature itself has compelled the necessity for the work. You can improve your Little Sodus and your Big Sodus, and you can find your way all through these little places in Michigan, the names of which are so obscure that you will not find them written down on any map, however minute, where perhaps there may not be anything more than a saw-mill or a farm-house seen in the yet uncut forest, and there in order to get saw-logs out of those native wilds you make these improvements; but where there is a town of twenty thousand inhabitants as there is at Oakland, where there is a growing city as there is at San Diego, where there are two and a half million passengers passing over the water-front that we ask to be improved, nothing whatever can be done; and why? Because it is so far off, being on the Pacific coast!

Is it because the representatives of that coast are few in Congress and we cannot be heeded? Or is it true that it is not the policy of Congress, no matter how urgent a case may be, to do anything toward new works of improvement, although they may be so important that you are drying up the sources of your commerce, although they may be so important that without them your harbors will be blockaded up, and the ships will sail for hundreds of miles along an inhospitable coast without opportunity for refuge or opportunity to land their cargoes? The difference between the continent of Africa to-day and that of Europe, and that of America, is that one is not indented with harbors, and there are no waters running from the ocean inland over which commerce can sail and the inhabitants get contact with the outside world. This circumstance makes the difference between barbarism, sterility, and degradation and civilization, cultivation and elevation. The difference is made by access to the ocean.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has spoken five minutes.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, this Oakland, if that be the name, is a place where a railroad has built a trestle-work out into San Francisco Bay on one side of it. It would cost several million dollars, I cannot tell how many, and is for the benefit of this railroad company. The engineers say this:

If such be the views of Congress—

That is it is not recommended, but—

If such be the views of Congress, and if it be decided to improve the harbor of Oakland, we recommend the appropriation of the amount necessary to construct the two training walls and dredge out a channel between them one hundred feet wide, having a depth of six feet at low water, at the present session of Congress, namely, $479,094.

The Committee on Commerce do not look upon this Oakland scheme as a proper one for it to take hold of at this time. If there is any State in the Union that has no reason to complain of the liberality of this Government, certainly it is the State of California. The Senator forgets that we are paying $1,075,000 a year subsidy to two steam lines for the benefit of the commerce of San Francisco. He forgets that we have been paying this enormous sum for years. He forgets that this nation has expended millions and tens of millions of dollars in building a railroad for California and in building this very railroad that now comes into this town of Oakland and asks an enormous appropriation to create a harbor where none exists and when they might have terminated their road upon a good harbor just as well as run it out on trestle-work where there is no harbor. I ask for a vote.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. On behalf of the Committee on Commerce I propose after line 71 of section 2 to insert:

Red River of the North, from Breckinridge to Moorhead.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to make a correction in line 73 of section 2. "West Virginia" should be inserted where "Kentucky" is. The river is in West Virginia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The amendment will be considered as agreed to if there be no objection.

Mr. CHANDLER. After line 80 of section 2 the committee propose to insert:

Big Sandy River, from its mouth to Piketon and to Warfield, in Kentucky.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. After line 85, section 2, the committee propose to insert:

For a channel of land-locked navigation from the Mississippi River, at or near New Orleans, along the lakes, sounds, and estuaries of the gulf shores, thence by river and canal across the peninsula of Florida to harbors of the Atlantic coast.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. In line 89 of section 2, before "Wicomico," the word "Little" ought to be inserted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. CHANDLER. There is one amendment that the committee propose on page 14, line 318 of section 1—to insert the following, which does not increase any appropriation, but simply explains how an appropriation shall be expended:

That the appropriation under the act of March 3, 1873, for the improvement of the harbors of Washington and Georgetown, be made to apply to dredging the Virginia or Georgetown channel of the Potomac above and below Long Bridge, and that the earth excavated therefrom be deposited so as to carry out as far as practicable the plan for improving the harbors of Washington and Georgetown in accordance with the report made to Congress December 17, 1872, by a board of survey created by an act of Congress approved March 5, 1872.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I have a little amendment to offer at the end of the bill for a survey.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to inquire now whether the second section is retained or not? The committee recommended striking it out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment has been disagreed to.

Mr. STEVENSON. I should like to inquire of the gentleman who has the bill in charge whether the committee insist on their amendment to strike out in the bill from line 319 to the end of the first section?

Mr. CHANDLER. No; that amendment has been non-concurred in. That clause remains as it passed the House.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I offer the following amendment, to come in after line 190 of section 2, for the survey of a little harbor on the Potomac River:

Harbor of Leonardtown, Britton Bay, Potomac River, Maryland, with a view to remove obstructions.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RANSOM. I offer an amendment on page 10, line 224, to strike out "one" and insert "two;" so that the clause will read:

For continuing the improvement of the Cape Fear River, North Carolina, $200,000.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope that amendment will not be agreed to. The committee did not recommend an increase of the amount in this bill, but struck out certain items and added the amounts that were stricken out for other works. All the additions that were recommended have been concurred in and none of the diminutions. Now I have upon my desk something over $4,000,000 of proposed amendments to this bill. It must be apparent to every one that if we begin to adopt these amendments they will load the bill so heavily that it will sink.

Now, sir, with regard to Cape Fear River, I hold in my hands the revised estimate of the engineers, which I will read. The original estimate of the board of engineers was: "For Cape Fear River $150,000." The revised estimate was $100,000, and the committee allowed precisely the amount asked for in the revised estimate. I hope the Senate will stand by the committee and by the recommendation of the board of engineers, and retain the Cape Fear appropriation at $100,000, as it stands in the bill.

Mr. RANSOM. Mr. President, I will not detain the Senate at this late hour more than a few moments. The statements made by the chairman of the Committe on Commerce are true. This amendment for $200,000 is not recommended either in the revised or original estimates from the Engineer Department. But there is now before the Committee on Commerce, and I have instructed the clerk to have it here for the information of the Senate, a letter from Colonel Craighill, the engineer in charge of the work. In that letter this officer, distinguished for his skill and judgment and thoroughly acquainted with the Cape Fear Harbor, declares that an appropriation of $250,000 ought to be made for this improvement. I will have the letter read for the information of any Senator who desires it. The experiences of last year leave no doubt that $100,000 is totally inadequate for the consummation of the work. But, in the opinion of this reliable engineer, an expenditure of $250,000 promises results that make it our duty not to hesitate to make the appropriation. Not only his reports, but the concurrent reports of all the officers who have examined the Cape Fear Harbor, without exception, abound with evidence that for the meager amounts appropriated extraordinary results have been accomplished; and I believe that with the expenditure of the sum now asked the highest expectations of the engineers will be realized. I shall not undertake to explain to the Senate the manner in which this improvement is to take place. I will simply state that is the judgment of every competent engineer, fortified by the conclusion of all men of practical sense who have a knowledge of the harbor, and confirmed by uniform experience for half a century.

Nor, Mr. President, is this a mere local work. Let me assure the Senate that it is a great national improvement. Look at our Atlantic coast. You will see that the Wilmington or Cape Fear Harbor lies not very far south of Cape Hatteras, on the great coast line of American trade. It is well known to mariners that Hatteras is one of the most, if not the most, dangerous point upon the American or any other coast. I do not know what to say of it except that it seems to be the rendezvous for all the perils of the sea. Cape Fear Harbor, lying immediately south of this fearful impediment to navigation, is a convenient refuge for the crippled and wrecked vessels that have survived its winds and rocks and storms. I need not say to the Senate how important, how prudent, how humane it is that this harbor of refuge for the commerce of the whole coast should be cared for by the Government.

And let me say that in another sense the port of Wilmington greatly deserves our consideration. Are Senators aware that the exports of Wilmington for the last year amounted to $13,000,000; that thirteen hundred vessels were entered and cleared at her bar; that her shipping-list in the year 1873 increased one hundred and twenty vessels; that her exports of lumber reached twenty million feet, her resin a half million of barrels, her turpentine two hundred thousand casks, her cotton fifty thousand bales? Situated as Wilmington is in the heart of the cotton and great lumber region of the South, at the mouth of the Cape Fear River, which runs back two hundred and fifty miles to the inexhaustible coal and iron beds of North Carolina, with three trunk lines of railway extending north, south, and west, almost in speaking distance of Cuba and the West Indies, and with a coast line from the Gulf to the northern lakes, she must become the great depot and market for lumber, for coal, for naval stores, and for all the productions of that section of the country. Why, there is not a city on the waters of the Atlantic that is not interested in the improvement of Cape Fear Harbor. In Norfolk, Richmond, Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, Boston, you will find the naval stores, the lumber, the turpentine and resin of Wilmington. The whole country has an interest in this improvement.

There is another consideration which I wish to address to the Senate. I have before me—and I regret that I have not time to read it—a speech of Hon. William S. Ashe, formerly a Representative from the Wilmington district in the other House of Congress, delivered in 1858. I must say that I knew him well, and I never knew a man of more intelligence, more patriotism, or better common sense. In that speech he informed the House that before the erection of Fort Caswell in 1823, the bar at Wilmington drew from sixteen to twenty feet of water. The position of the fort and its influences on the current of water and sand-drifts soon filled the channel and left only some nine feet of water——

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The Senator has spoken five minutes.

Mr. RANSOM. I appeal to the Senate to adopt the amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER. Permit me to say that the Senator is reading from the local engineer's report. Were we to take the reports of the local engineers on all these different works, $30,000,000 would not begin to carry out their wishes. We take the report of the board of engineers, and we have given every cent that the board of engineers asked for this work, to wit, $100,000, and that is the largest appropriation which has ever been made to that harbor, and the Senator himself says the benefit has been incalcuable from the $100,000 appropriations which we have heretofore made. I hope therefore the Senate will stand by the recommendation of the board of engineers and leave this appropriation as it is. It is the largest made for any harbor in the United States.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I had occasion when this appropriation was first introduced into the Senate to approve of it. I approve of it because the improvement is in a section of the country which makes it national in its character. It is national because we are deriving immense advantages from the industries of that section. Whenever the Congress of the United States can contribute their moiety, their pittance, in any direction where it will be of advantage to that section of country, it is important that Congress should do it.

The Senator from North Carolina has urged this proposition from its local considerations. I urge it from its national considerations. Without the industries as they are developed at the South, this country, bearing its great debt, would be prostrate to-day. Take California, with all its accumulations through mines and minerals, or any other portion of your country, and it cannot compare with this region in the accumulation of balances favorable to your industries. It is upon your foreign balances that you are to-day able to sustain whatever financial credit you have. I trust the Senate will accord to the request of the Senator from North Carolina for the appropriation he desires. It will be the money best spent of any appropriated on any of the bills I have seen entertained in the Senate. I hope that the request of the Senator from North Carolina will be favorably considered.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask leave to submit a report from the second committee of conference on the bill (H. R. No. 2343) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes.

The conference report has been heretofore agreed to by the Senate, but was disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and a second committee appointed. The only difference between the two Houses was on the single item of the appropriation for the Apaches, the House disagreeing with the amount which the Senate required for that purpose. The second conference have reduced that appropriation $50,000, making it $500,000 instead of $550,000. That being the only difference, I ask that we have a vote at once on the report.

The report was concurred in.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (S. No. 732) supplementary to the act entitled "An act to incorporate the Texas Pacific Railroad Company and to aid in the construction of its road, and for other purposes."

The message also announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 3030) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1873 and 1874, and for other purposes.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3168) making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] increasing the appropriation for continuing the improvement of the Cape Fear River, North Carolina, from $100,000 to $200,000.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope it will not prevail.

The amendment was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 31, noes 10.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I offer the following amendment to come in on page 12, after line 278:

That the sum of $50,000 is appropriated for the opening and improving of the channel between Staten Island and New Jersey.

Mr. President, New Jersey has made very few applications for appropriations of this kind by the Government. This is a very essential one. There is a narrow strait of water between Staten Island and New Jersey known as Arthur Kill. It does not belong to the jurisdiction of either New York or New Jersey exclusively. All the commerce passing from the city of New York to Philadelphia has to pass through this narrow strait. As it is now, it is not navigable except at high tide. Consequently, there is a great delay in vessels and a great expense in consequence of vessels getting aground there. I will state that the navigation through that strait which comes from the Delaware and Raritan Canal alone is $40,000,000 a year, and the whole navigation is impeded by the delay in consequence of the necessity of dredging out that strait. We now ask this small appropriation of $50,000, which is really a national appropriation, for no vessel can have any inland navigation between those cities except through that narrow strait.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not know that it is worth while for me to attempt to resist any additions to this bill. My impression now is that the intention is to load this bill until it is loaded down, and hence I shall not resist anything. I will inquire, does this amendment come from any committee?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Notice was given of it and it was served upon your committee.

Mr. CHANDLER. My committee did not adopt it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. No; but notice was given of it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I make the point of order on it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. What committee could it come from?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. EDMUNDS in the chair.) Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. CHANDLER. I made a point of order, and I ask the Chair to rule upon it. The amendment is not recommended by any committee.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Notice was given of this amendment, and it was served on the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator from New Jersey to say that he gave notice of this amendment and had it referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I did.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The thirtieth rule provides in the first place for amendments to general appropriation bills. This bill is not a general appropriation bill, but is a special appropriation bill which does not go to the Committee on Appropriations. In this respect the language of the thirtieth rule provides:

> And in like manner, notice of amendments to bills making appropriations for rivers and harbors shall be given and referred to the committee to which such bills shall be referred.

The Chair is of opinion that the words "in like manner" in connection with what precedes them refer to the fact of notice and do not refer to the provision of carrying out any existing law, &c., for the provision is:

> All amendments to general appropriation bills reported from committees of the Senate, proposing new items of appropriation, shall, one day before they are offered, be referred, &c.

And "in like manner notice of amendments to bills making appropriations for rivers and harbors" shall be referred. The Chair is of opinion that amendments to these bills must be reported from some committee and then referred, but it is not necessary that they shall be made to carry out the provision of an existing law. Therefore, if the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey was referred to the Committee on Commerce on the recommendation of any other committee, it is in order. If it was referred merely on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey alone, the Chair is of opinion that it is not in order.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Well, Mr. President, for information, with all respect, I ask how is the judgment of the Committee on Commerce ever to be corrected? There is no committee to whom I could apply to have that recommendation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is unable to answer that question, but only undertakes to administer the rule as in the opinion of the Chair it was evidently intended to be administered.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. I send an amendment to the desk, to insert in section 2, making provision for surveys, line 53, after the word "bar" the words "and Red Fish Bar;" so that it will read:

> Cedar Bayou Bar and Red Fish Bar, in Galveston Bay, Texas.

The chairman of the committee agrees to this amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Texas. I offer another amendment, to insert in the same section, after line 78, the words "mouth of Saginaw River, Michigan."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WEST. I am instructed by the Committee on Transportation Routes to the Sea-board to offer the following amendment as an additional section to the bill:

> SEC. —. That a board of engineers, to be composed of two from the Army, two from the Coast Survey, and three from civil life, be appointed by the President; which said board shall make a survey of the mouth of the Mississippi River, with a view to determine the best method of obtaining and maintaining a depth of water sufficient for the purposes of commerce, either by a canal from said river to the waters of the Gulf, or by deepening one or more of the natural outlets of said river; and said board shall make a full and detailed estimate and statement of the cost of each of said plans, and shall report the same, together with their opinion thereon, showing which of all said plans they deem preferable, giving their reasons therefor, to the Secretary of War, to be presented at the commencement of the second session of the Forty-third Congress; and that the sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM. I offer the following amendment, to come in on line 125, page 6:

> Strike out "50" and insert "200," so as to increase the appropriation for continuing the improvement of the Falls of Saint Anthony from $50,000 to $200,000.

I ask the attention of the Senate to this amendment. It is one in which I feel a great interest, and I believe that if the Senate understand it there will be no question about its adoption.

When the Department were requested at the opening of this session to revise and reduce their estimates they sent back the following statement:

> Having thus presented the reasons for the scale of expenditure recommended by this department, I have now, in conformity to the resolution of the House of Representatives and the requirements of the President and Secretary of War, to submit revised estimates, taking for guide the appropriations of the last river and harbor act, with the condition added that the estimates shall not be so reduced as to cause serious detriment to the public service. The estimate of amounts needed for the preservation of the Falls of Saint Anthony, and the deepening of the channel at the mouth of the Mississippi River, are instances where the original estimates are retained under the latter condition.

Thus among all the improvements named for the country but two were selected upon which specific stress was laid by the department that the amounts estimated for were required and could not be reduced without serious detriment to the public service.

Now, Mr. President, the amount that I have offered conforms to the reduced estimates of the department. It is the amount which the department say must be appropriated in order that the public service may be subserved. I ask that the amount thus demanded by the department, which they say is absolutely necessary, may be appropriated.

The appropriation recommended here by the department is for the preservation of the Falls of Saint Anthony. We have above those Falls now eighty miles of river navigation. We have around in the region which is benefited by that navigation over two million bushels of wheat produced at present, and within the next three or four years it will be ten millions. The saving produced by this navigation to-day is seven cents per bushel on transportation, amounting to over $140,000 a year. The department tell us that unless the amount they ask for is appropriated there is great peril that the Falls of Saint Anthony will go out within the next year. It is but a thousand feet from the lower edge of the falls to-day to the upper end, and a thin rock alone protects it, and the water is already percolating through the sand below. It is of the most imminent necessity that whatever is done should be done at once in order that that navigation may be maintained, and as our investigations this summer showed, a slight appropriation above the Falls of Saint Anthony will give us five hundred miles of navigation into the finest wheat region in the world.

Now, Mr. President, if these falls are permitted to go out we shall have to expend many millions of dollars in order to build a dam there. If they do go out we shall have eight or ten miles of rapids which can never be improved without the appropriation of many millions. A small amount now will save it, and as the department tell us they must have that amount, and when asked to reduce it say they could not cut it down without serious detriment to the public service, I ask that it may be allowed.

Mr. CHANDLER. I merely wish to state that not one single dollar of this $50,000 or the $200,000 is used even in the interest of navigation. It has no more business in this bill than an appropriation to build a saw-mill on any river in these United States. It is simply to protect a water-power. They have not dug a single foot to improve navigation. They have not done a thing except to spend this money to protect a water-power at the Falls of Saint Anthony.

Mr. President, I am sorry the Senator from Minnesota has offered this amendment, for it will compel me to state the facts in this case. The committee with great reluctance took the appropriation as it stands, because it was in the bill as it came to us from the House. The opinion of the committee was unanimous that this appropriation had no business whatever in this appropriation bill. We are not in the habit of building dams and spending hundreds of thousands of dollars to protect the private water-power of anybody.

Mr. RAMSEY. I will say to the honorable Senator, if that is so, the committee were very poorly possessed of information.

Mr. CHANDLER. We had all the information we could have.

Mr. RAMSEY. I cannot conceive that any committee properly informed on this subject would come to such a conclusion.

The Senator says this is an inappropriate appropriation. By it you save a navigation already in use upon which steamers ply for seventy-five miles, and with a few changes in the channel, with here and there a change, the removal of a bowlder or a few rocks, you can have five hundred miles of good navigation above the Falls of Saint Anthony.

The theory on which the appropriation has been made to Saint Anthony Falls from time to time is that if these falls were swept out the river would be, as my colleague says, a continuation of rapids instead of a navigable stream above. Surely no one wants to let the Father of Waters run down into such a contemptible condition of things as that, and you can save it all by this small appropriation. The common pride of an American citizen would prevent him allowing that kind of degradation to this great river, if there was no other motive.

But, sir, at the Falls of Saint Anthony we have an immense water-power that we desire to save, not for ourselves alone, but for the nation. You may say it is an individual matter, a mere private enterprise; but it is so large that it becomes national in its character. There at those falls by the mill-power they have they turn out seven thousand barrels of flour every week; millions and millions of bushels of wheat are turned into flour there; besides a great number of other enterprises. It is one of the largest lumber establishments; a larger amount of lumber-sawing is done there than in almost any other locality on the continent.

Mr. THURMAN. Will my friend allow me to ask a question?

Mr. RAMSEY. I have but five minutes.

Mr. THURMAN. If there is such an amount of business there, cannot the proprietors of those mills secure their works themselves?

Mr. RAMSEY. Well, sir, they have done so; they have almost reduced themselves to poverty by their efforts in this direction. The towns in that vicinity have taxed themselves three or four hundred thousand dollars to save that water-power. Now, would the Senator, in the face of all these facts, and the large interest the nation has in this work, make these people individually tax themselves to their perfect ruin and destruction?

Mr. SPRAGUE. From the statement made by the chairman of the committee who reported this bill, I deem it my duty to move that lines 123, 124, 125, and 126 be stricken from the bill. Those lines read as follows:

For continuing the improvement of the Falls of Saint Anthony and for the improvement of the Mississippi River above the Falls of Saint Anthony, Minnesota, $50,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is that an amendment to the pending amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SPRAGUE. I move that that be laid on the table.

Mr. CHANDLER. Let the amendment be reported. I could not hear the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I move to lay the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota on the table.

Mr. WINDOM. I hope the Senator from Rhode Island will allow me to answer the Senator from Michigan.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator moves that the amendment be laid on the table. The Chair is informed the effect of that motion on this bill will be to carry the bill with it. The question is on the motion, which is not debatable, to lay the amendment on the table.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM. The Senator from Michigan says that his committee were unanimous in opposing this amendment. If the Senator ventured in the quiet of the committee-room to make such statements as he has made before the Senate to-night and the committee did not take the trouble to investigate them, I do not wonder that the committee were unanimous on that subject, for I assert here just as strongly as the Senator from Michigan has made his assertions, that he is wholly mistaken, and that there is scarcely a word that is true in a single sentence he uttered on the subject.

Mr. CHANDLER. Allow me to ask the Senator whether a dollar was ever expended on the Falls of Saint Anthony for the purpose of navigation?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. WEST. I move that the Senator have leave to proceed.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I object.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM. I do not desire to proceed more than a moment or two. I simply wish to answer the question of the Senator from Michigan. I say, yes. I say there have been vessels running there for many years. They were suspended for a short time on account of the fact that the railroads were built and the river was not improved above; but recently, within the last year or two, on account of the high prices prevailing upon the railroads, the vessels have again been put upon that river, and are now carrying wheat and corn in large quantities from that section. While it is true that there is an interest there, which is a very large interest, too, that is anxious to have the water-power maintained, it is also a continuation of the navigation of that river for five or six hundred miles.

Another thing is very remarkable, that this should be one of the two things which the department of this Government having this subject in charge say are indispensably necessary to be done. I have known for some time that the Senator from Michigan was determined that nothing should be done here. He has from the very start set his face against this improvement, and determined whatever may be the consequences to the navigation of that country that by every means in his power this thing shall not be done; and I see that determination is sought to be carried out here to-night. Not only have this department when asked to revise their estimates refused to reduce them in this case, but they sent a board of five engineers to make an examination this winter, and when that special board made their examination, they came back and reported the same recommendations that are made here to-night by the report of the Engineer Department to which I have referred.

Now, sir, I say this appropriation is of the utmost importance to five hundred miles of navigation that can be made above the falls at very little expense; and I do not believe that when the Senate have staid here to-night and appropriated $30,000,000 under the other bill that we have just passed without question, they are going to permit this great improvement to remain unfinished and this great peril to the interests of that northern country to be suffered. I ask for a vote on my amendment.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I have no doubt of the importance of improving the navigation of the Mississippi above the Falls of Saint Anthony; that there is a long distance there which if improved will promote the interests of commerce; but whenever you bring the products of that country lying above those falls down to that point, before they can take the river below, they must be reshipped, and if reshipped there must be a cartage of a certain distance; it may be one mile and it may be two. It is impossible for this Government to do anything to prevent that transshipment of merchandise. The same thing must take place with anything that is going up the river.

Now the question is, what is the duty of the Government with reference to the preservation of the falls? There is no such thing as preventing a transshipment of the merchandise; but if the Government will spend its hundreds of thousands and preserve the falls, the distance of cartage will be shorter than if the falls are broken away and there become a few miles of rapids. The interest of commerce and the interest of transportation simply depend upon whether you shall do that cartage one or two miles, as you do it now, or shall be obliged to do it five or ten if the falls go away. That is all the difference as far as I understand it, and it is a question whether the Government will appropriate money to provide transportation by teams instead of by water, two or ten miles, more or less.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM.]

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope the appropriation will not be increased.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 31, noes 10.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 30, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bogy, Boreman, Carpenter, Conover, Cragin, Davis, Edmunds, Fenton, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Johnston, Kelly, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Ramsey, Ransom, Schurz, Tipton, Wadleigh, West, and Windom—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Boutwell, Buckingham, Chandler, Dennis, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, McCreery, Pratt, Saulsbury, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Sprague, Stevenson, Thurman, and Washburn—21.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brownlow, Cameron, Clayton, Conkling, Cooper, Dorsey, Ferry of Connecticut, Ferry of Michigan, Gilbert, Harvey, Howe, Jones, Lewis, Logan, Merrimon, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Robertson, Sargent, Stewart, Stockton, and Wright—22.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM. As a portion of the same amendment I move to insert after the word "dollars," on line 126, page 6, the words, "and $25,000 of said amount shall be expended for the improvement of the Mississippi River above the Falls of Saint Anthony."

This amendment does not increase the appropriation, but simply divides it.

Mr. THURMAN. Let us understand that. Is that $25,000 of the $200,000?

Mr. WINDOM. Yes, sir.

Mr. THURMAN. That leaves $175,000 to be expended on the falls?

Mr. WINDOM. Yes, sir; $25,000 less than the estimates.

Mr. THURMAN. Well, Mr. President, I think this amendment discloses the whole secret of this business. If there was any doubt before about it there cannot be now. Here was an amendment proposed to increase the appropriation for the Falls of Saint Anthony $150,000, and one might suppose that a large portion of that was to improve the navigation of the Mississippi above those falls, which might be a very reasonable thing. Now it turns out only $25,000 is to be appropriated for that purpose and $175,000 for the protection of the mill-owners at the falls. That is the whole of it.

Mr. WINDOM. I stated in the discussion on the other amendment that the $200,000 was for the improvement of the falls, but it is necessary in order to perfect the navigation through the eighty miles I spoke of to have a few loose rocks removed, and we are willing to give a portion of the estimates for the falls in order to do that work. This does not increase the appropriation already made. I will not occupy any further time upon it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM. I now offer an amendment to come in at the end of line 318. It is for the surveys which the Senate directed by a resolution passed the other day:

For surveys and estimates for the improvements recommended by the Senate Select Committee on Transportation Routes to the Sea-board, upon the four routes indicated in the report of said committee, and also upon a route from the mouth of the Youghiogheny River, to continue the slack-water navigation up said river to its head-waters at the foot of the Alleghany Mountains, thence by Canal to Cumberland, intersecting there the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal, $200,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War in such manner as in his judgment will secure the greatest amount of exact information for each of said routes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like the Senator to state where these four routes are precisely, so that we can see what sections of the country they traverse.

Mr. WINDOM. They are the four routes recommended by the Committee on Transportation. One is the Mississippi route from the head to the mouth. The other is known as the northern lake route; the other the central route on the Ohio River, connecting with the Atlantic near Richmond; and the other is a route including the improvement of the Tennessee and its connections with the Atlantic Ocean. I have a map before me which will explain them to the Senator better than I can. They were fully explained in the report of the committee, and in the discussion the other day. The Committee on Appropriations report this amendment under the instruction of the Senate.

Mr. BOREMAN. I ask the Senator from Minnesota if these are not the routes described in the resolution we passed the other day?

Mr. WINDOM. They are the same.

Mr. BOREMAN. We instructed the committee to do this thing?

Mr. WINDOM. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAVIS. I want to say a word on this amendment. As I understand, this is the amount recommended in the resolution which was discussed for several days in the Senate and passed by a vote on the yeas and nays of 43 in favor of it and but 6 against it.

Mr. ROBERTSON. This is not the amount.

Mr. DAVIS. It is exactly the same amount as was then stated by the chairman of the Committee on Transportation Routes to be necessary.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. The resolution did not state the amount, as I understand; but I believe this amount was stated in the debate on that resolution.

Mr. DAVIS. It was stated several times.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I have no objection to the surveys being made, but I do object to the large amount appropriated in this amendment. I move to strike out "$200,000" and insert "$50,000."

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I call for the yeas and nays on that question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ALCORN. I will ask whether the amendment contains a provision that only so much shall be used as may be necessary for the purpose? I suppose it does.

Mr. WINDOM. I believe it does not contain that. I have no objection to making it so, however.

Mr. SHERMAN. That follows in all appropriations.

Mr. ALCORN. If that amendment should be made I think it would be better.

Mr. WINDOM. I will modify it in that way with the consent of the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. That would be an unusual form. That follows necessarily. When an amount is appropriated, that is the maximum.

Mr. WINDOM. I have no objection to that modification.

Mr. ALCORN. I do not insist upon it.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I do not think that makes any difference. They will expend the whole of it.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 39, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Bogy, Boreman, Boutwell, Buckingham, Carpenter, Clayton, Conover, Davis, Edmunds, Fenton, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hager, Hamlin, Harvey, Johnston, Kelly, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Sargent, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Spencer, Stevenson, Stewart, West, and Windom—39.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Cooper, Dennis, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, McCreery, Merrimon, Robertson, Saulsbury, Sprague, Wadleigh, and Washburn—12.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brownlow, Cameron, Chandler, Conkling, Cragin, Dorsey, Ferry of Connecticut, Gilbert, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Jones, Lewis, Logan, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Ransom, Stockton, Thurman, Tipton, and Wright—22.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALCORN. I am instructed by the Select Committee on the Levees of the Mississippi River to offer the amendment I send to the desk, which has been referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The Secretary read the amendment, as follows:

For the protection of the delta of the Mississippi from inundation by flood, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, in rebuilding, repairing, and constructing levees on or near the bank of the Mississippi River, $2,000,000; one-half of which sum shall be appropriated within the State of Louisiana, the other half to be appropriated, one-half within the State of Mississippi, the remainder within the State of Arkansas.

Mr. ALCORN. Mr. President, the demand for the time of the Senate will not allow me, if there was no rule requiring me to confine my remarks to five minutes, to present as fully as the case requires the importance of this subject. The levees of the Mississippi River were destroyed by the armies during the period of the revolution. Up to that time the country had gone forward in the construction of levees on the Mississippi River, and had spent about $20,000,000 or perhaps more. When the war closed full $10,000,000 of that work had been destroyed. Since that time the people of the States on the river have gone forward in the vain effort to attempt to rebuild the levees without any aid from the Government of the United States. Their attempt has been in vain. The recent floods have shown clearly to them and to the whole country that they are not able to accomplish the work; that it is a work impossible of accomplishment upon their part.

If the Congress of the United States can appropriate $200,000 for the purpose of protecting or improving the Falls of Saint Anthony, it occurs to me that it can give $2,000,000 for the purpose of recovering seven hundred miles of waste land upon the Mississippi River that have been recently inundated upon both sides of that stream by the floods upon the Mississippi.

This is a question that attaches to the whole country. It is one in which every man in this nation is interested. Every man who wears a cotton shirt in the United States is interested in this question. Besides the cotton that is produced behind these levees, it is necessary to the interest of the Government of the United States in its commerce. The Secretary of the Treasury in 1869 reported to Congress, when speaking upon the subject of cotton:

The great staples of the South have for many years constituted a large portion of our exports. But for the cotton held in that section at the close of the rebellion the foreign exchanges would have been so largely against the United States that a commercial convulsion would have been imminent if not unavoidable. Even in the deplorable condition of those States, last year more than two-thirds of our exports consisted of their productions; and it is the crop of the present year, small though it may be, that is to save us from ruinous indebtedness to Europe.

By reason of the destruction of the levees the falling off of the cotton crop will be this year, I apprehend, fully two hundred thousand bales. We have made an appropriation in the sundry civil bill of $500,000 to feed the people who have been rendered homeless, whose homes have been overflown by the recent floods of the Mississippi River. Should this amendment that I have offered to the river and harbor bill be adopted, I trust that that amendment which was introduced into the sundry civil appropriation bill will be stricken out, and that the two millions appropriated by this amendment will be applied in such a way as to supply the people who are now starving, as it is reported here, with work, so as to employ them in the protection of their own homes, and thus furnish sufficient for their maintenance during the year.

Five hundred thousand dollars have been appropriated to feed them during this season. What is the condition in which the coming flood will find these people? Unable to reconstruct their levees, the floods of 1875 will have them at their mercy. They can raise no crops this year; they can certainly raise none the coming year unless the levees are reconstructed. They present to you here the fact that they are unable to accomplish this task themselves. A memorial which was presented by me from the levee board in Mississippi presents the fact to the country that they are now——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has spoken five minutes.

Mr. ALCORN. I ask to close this sentence and I will say no more. They present the fact that the property there pays an annual tax of 10 per cent. on its assessed value, and they state that it is valued at one-third more than its worth. The people have done this to provide levees and protect the land. We ask the Government now to come and assist us in this great work.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, the Government has from time to time granted 21,000,000 acres of land, which are said to be the very best lands of the delta, for this purpose. The law relative to the condition as to reclamation on which the grant is made reads as follows:

Provided, however, That the proceeds of said lands, whether from sale or by direct appropriation of any kind, shall be applied exclusively, as far as necessary, to the purpose of reclaiming said lands by means of the levees and drains aforesaid.

To the State of Arkansas the grant was 6,805,000 acres; to Mississippi, 2,681,000; to Louisiana, 8,421,000; to Alabama, 392,000; to Missouri, 3,177,000 acres. These lands, I am told, when the levees are in perfect order, will be worth $100 an acre, which would be $21,000,000. Now, I should like to know what disposition has been made of these lands, and whether it is proposed, after the Government has built the levees, to return the lands to the United States; for it would be an immense speculation if we could get back the lands which we have actually given to build these levees. I suppose the intention is to return these lands to the United States. Is it so?

Mr. ALCORN. I will reply, with the permission of the Senate, that a bill which I had the honor to introduce in the Senate some time since proposed that the lands which belonged to the States of Arkansas, Mississippi, and Louisiana, and which were received from the Government of the United States, should be returned. Some of those lands have been passed into the hands of individuals, and as a matter of course they cannot be returned if held by individuals now. But I will state to the Senate a fact. The memorial to which I referred a moment ago sets forth that in the levee district in Mississippi there are thirteen hundred thousand acres of land. The fact is stated and correctly, I undertake to say, that only four hundred thousand acres of that land to-day pays taxes, that the balance has reverted to the State, and that no taxes have been paid upon it since the war. I venture to say to-day that of the lands which were donated by the Government of the United States to the State of Mississippi—and I speak of what I know; I am not so well acquainted with Arkansas and Louisiana—not 10 per cent. to-day is held and claimed by individuals. The bulk of it has reverted to the State.

Mr. President, may I be permitted here to present the fact as to the district of country on the Mississippi—and I speak now of the State of Mississippi alone; others are better able to speak of Arkansas and Louisiana—that in 1840, before the levees were built, before the grant was made, the country along the Mississippi, the delta on the Mississippi side, produced 39,000 bales of cotton; in 1850, ten years after, and before the grant, there were 42,000 bales of cotton raised, an increase of only 3,000 bales in ten years. The grant was made in 1850. In 1860 the cotton produced in that district amounted to 156,000 bales. Now, with the levees swept away, with the levees destroyed, the country returns to its original condition; it becomes a swamp again.

More than that, instead of producing, as that country did produce in 1861 after this report had been made, 210,000 bales of cotton, I venture to predict that this year it will not produce 50,000 bales of cotton.

If this appropriation be made, the recovery of those plantations which produced two hundred thousand bales will be a fixed fact, and instead of fifty thousand bales as that country will produce this year—I speak of the Mississippi side alone—it will be able next year to produce at least two hundred thousand bales of cotton. Here is a difference, then, in the cash account to the Government of the United States in her exports that exceeds far in value the appropriation that is asked here to-day. I present this question not merely in behalf of the people there; I would put it upon no such ground as that; I would ask it as a measure of national importance, holding as I do that the cotton of this country is necessary to preserve the credit account of the Government of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, it appears to me from a somewhat careful consideration of this subject, that the United States has no constitutional power to enter into any scheme for improving the lands or preserving the territory of a State from overflow or any other calamity. We may give money for charity, as we often have done, although that used to be questioned, but I do not open that question now. But when the United States undertakes to provide for protecting the lands within the sovereignty and jurisdiction of a given State from being overflowed, or from malaria, or from any other thing which relates to the advantageous cultivation of those lands, or to the health of the inhabitants, or to whatever it may relate, it is plain to me that we transcend the limits of our constitutional power and invade the province of the State. I feel quite sure that if this were a proposition for the advantage of the public alone and which a particular State had objection to and chose to take care of itself, everybody almost would agree that we could not undertake to provide for clearing up the swamps of the various States without their consent. The Constitution, supposing these States would consent, does not confer on us the power to tax the people, in my opinion, for the purpose of improving the swamps or drying them up, or doing any other thing which relates to the advantage of the territory of the State in which these lands lie. I think we have no such power; I think it would be dangerous to undertake to exercise it; and upon that point of view alone, without going into any other consideration now, I shall feel obliged to vote against this amendment.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, I feel reluctant to detain the Senate at this hour of the night; and I also feel quite confident that this subject cannot be discussed appropriately in the brief time that is left under the rules of the Senate; but I shall ask the Senate to recur to the circumstance that in the special session of the Senate commencing with the Forty-third Congress a resolution was passed instructing the Committee on Levees to sit during the recess and to investigate this subject, and to devise a plan to be submitted at the present session, embracing perhaps the constitutional powers of the Government as well as the scientific principles that it might be necessary to apply to redeem those lands. Unfortunately the Southwest was scourged during the past season with a terrible epidemic, and most of the members of the committee did not think it prudent to assemble to carry out the work that was assigned to them. Some of us were there, but not in sufficient number to act as a committee, and our labors did not amount to anything. In the mean time this terrific calamity, this overflow beyond and without a precedent in the history of this country, has devastated an immense area in that region, and the impoverished people of that section have appealed to Congress for relief. Their appeal has been met in a most generous spirit. Congress has to-night completed an appropriation of $500,000, making $690,000 in all given to save those people from absolute famine.

Now, sir, we have truly no specific plan to submit to Congress. We are asked, have we a system that will justify the Government in embarking upon this work? We say no, because in our effort to obtain that system or to study it and present it intelligibly to Congress, we were frustrated by the incident I have mentioned; but having been overtaken by this calamity, with all the barriers against flood broken down, we appeal to Congress now to come to our relief, giving them the assurance that unless they do, the same distress will occur in that region the coming season and probably we shall be compelled unfortunately, and very regretfully you can be assured, once more to appeal to you for relief.

The distribution of this money will not only do what the Senator from Mississippi has pointed out, but it will give labor, it will give bread, it will give occupation to numbers of people there that are desiring to be employed. It will repair the crevasses that have been caused by this flood; it will save the land from overflow again, which will most inevitably occur in the coming season of high water next spring; and although it may not be within the province of Congress, as the Senator from Vermont says, to protect any man's lands from overflow and destruction, yet I am convinced that were this appropriation made the States that are named in the amendment would gladly return any amount of land that now lies utterly useless as a consequence of this overflow.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That would not relieve the constitutional question.

Mr. WEST. It might, because it would be a compensation back again for its outlay. The Government might spend the money and be reimbursed for it, and I do not think the constitutional objection will come in there. However, I will leave that to my friend; he understands it better than I do.

The Senator from Michigan asks what we have done with the land that has been appropriated to us. Mr. President, long before that land was assigned to those States for the purpose named, all the available land on the banks of the river had been taken up, and levees were constructed there by private enterprise and by local authorities to protect those lands; but in the mean time these various crevasses came, and the back water and the high water overflowed our swamp lands, and our swamp lands to-day in the State of Louisiana sell for only twenty-five cents an acre. It is impossible for us to realize anything out of that fund to create such a system of protection as will enable us to realize the actual value of these lands. We are obliged to sell them just as they are. Now, could the United States come in and make this appropriation, undoubtedly the value of those lands would be enhanced very much, and I know that the State of Louisiana would gladly turn over again all the benefit that she has derived from them and all the lands that she has remaining.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's time has expired. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS. On page 8, line 176, I move to strike out "25" and insert "50;" so as to read:

For continuing the improvement of the Great Kanawha River, West Virginia, $50,000.

I will say that the estimate of the Department was $150,000. Twenty-five thousand dollars is all the bill gives.

Mr. CHANDLER. The revised estimates are $25,000. I will make the point of order that no such amendment was submitted to the Committee on Commerce. We have given precisely the amount of the revised estimates, $25,000. I make the point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the amendment in pursuance of the estimate of the department?

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly it is.

Mr. CHANDLER. The last revised estimates are filled in the bill.

Mr. DAVIS. It is in pursuance of an estimate and recommended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If it is in pursuance of an estimate of one of the heads of the Departments, it is within the rule.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I call the attention of the Chair to the latter paragraph of the rule. I do it not so much in this instance as to cover other cases. If this is ruled in I shall be governed accordingly. My understanding has been that the clause "new items of appropriation" applies to an increase of appropriation, and I think that has been the practice of the Senate. The rule reads:

All amendments to general appropriation bills reported from committees of the Senate, proposing new items of appropriation, shall, one day before they are offered, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

If my memory serves me aright, the practice of the Senate has been that any increase of appropriation that has been reported by any committee is considered under this technical language as a new item of appropriation. If that be the case, this amendment is without the rule.

Mr. DAVIS. We have already increased two or three items.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I will state that I had it in contemplation to move to raise an appropriation, but on reading the rule and recollecting the fact that it had been ruled several times as I have stated, I desisted from offering the amendment. I think the case of my friend from West Virginia comes within that scope.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish my friend had raised the point on his own amendment and not on mine.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This is a matter of considerable importance as a question of practice. I feel pretty safe in saying that on this bill any Senator who is fortified by an estimate from a head of a Department, which stands for this purpose exactly like providing to carry out the provisions of an existing law in another branch of the rule, is in order. These committees are entitled to report amendments which are not in pursuance of the estimates of heads of Departments, and those being reported from committees and thus having a responsible origin must be referred to the Committee on Appropriations to be considered. When you come to an offer which is to carry out an estimate of a head of Department, it stands on an appropriation bill exactly like the other head of carrying out a law; and any Senator has a right to move it and take the judgment of the Senate upon it, because there is no surprise to anybody. These rules are intended to prevent surprise.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I would add that while the former branch of the rule specifies the manner in which the amendment shall be recommended, yet the latter clause is a general expression, and covers all that comes under the former, for the language is general—

All amendments to general appropriation bills reported from committees of the Senate proposing new items of appropriation.

The question turns upon the words "new items." I think I am correct in stating that there are several cases where it has been ruled in the Senate that any increase of appropriations comes within this clause as a "new item."

Mr. EDMUNDS. No doubt; but "reported from committees of the Senate" is the description there.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that under the practice of the Senate this comes within the phrase "a new item;" that is, an amendment so far as it proposes an increase of appropriation would fall within that clause as a new item. But the former part of the rule is:

No amendment proposing additional appropriations shall be received to any general appropriation bill unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law—

That is one case—

or some act or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session—

That is another case—

or moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate—

That is another case—

or in pursuance of an estimate from a head of some of the Departments.

That is another substantive head of jurisdiction.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Now, following that—pardon me for calling the Chair's attention to it—is what? Remember the general term applying throughout the rule, "all amendments to general appropriation bills." And then after what the Chair has read is this as an additional requisite—

All amendments to general appropriation bills reported from the committees of the Senate—

And this is from a standing committee—proposing new items of appropriation.

This is a new item of appropriation reported by a committee; but in the latter clause has been added recently "and in like manner notice of amendments to bills making appropriations for rivers and harbors," so as to include the very bill that has been reported by the Committee on Commerce within the purview of this latter paragraph to which the general clause "all amendments" applies there shall be one day's notice given.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the Senator moving the amendment rests it on the ground that it is to fill an estimate from the head of a Department. If that be so, it certainly could not hurt it that it had also been recommended by a committee. It would stand on either head. The Chair understands the amendment has been referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. In that connection, on this point of order, I would say that I offered an amendment some time ago, when the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] was in the chair, and he ruled it out of order very properly, I not stating that there had been an estimate from the head of the Department, which is the fact, as there is no doubt in reference to it. Therefore I should like to renew that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is now on the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. May we understand then, from this ruling, that if an amendment comes with the recommendation of the head of a Department or is recommended by a standing committee, there is no necessity of giving one day's notice of the amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is another question. All amendments to appropriation bills, no matter which class they fall into, whether they are made to carry out the provisions of an existing law, or some resolution of the Senate passed at the present session, or moved by direction of a standing committee, must be referred to the Committee on Appropriations one day before they are offered in the Senate.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I understand that has not been done in this case. No such notice has been given.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The rule does not require that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is mistaken; the Senator from Vermont is right; this clause does not read as the Chair supposed, "All amendments to general appropriation bills reported from committees of the Senate proposing new items of appropriations shall one day," &c. If the amendment be offered to fill an estimate made by the head of a Department, the Chair does not see that it is necessary to refer it to the committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not at all. The rule was intended, as respects the reports of committees, where a committee reports a new amendment which is not to carry out the provisions of existing law, or an estimate, or a resolution of the Senate, such an amendment although it does come from a committee shall then go to the committee having charge of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report of the committee stands in the same relation to the Senate under this rule as the estimate of a Department does.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Precisely the same.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. So the Chair thinks.

Mr. SCOTT. There is another question; I do not wish to make it as bearing on this appropriation but on the general question, and that is this: It is stated here that there were original estimates which named larger amounts than the revised estimates. The original estimates have been revised; and when as in this case the original estimate of $150,000 is cut down to $25,000, can it be said that an appropriation made here exceeding the revised estimate is in pursuance of the estimate?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly not; nobody would contend for that.

Mr. SCOTT. I understand this case is one of that character.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That we do not know yet. We have to see what the estimate is yet.

Mr. DAVIS. The estimate originally was $150,000, and the revised estimate is $25,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the amount in the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is to increase it $50,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is above the revised estimate. Then it is not in order, because it is not pursuant to the last estimate.

Mr. CHANDLER. The head of the Department has recommended the revised estimates and no more; and any attempt to raise above the revised estimates is not recommended by the Department.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from West Virginia to concede the fact to be as stated by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask the Senator from Michigan if the committee in making up the bill followed the revised estimates?

Mr. CHANDLER. Pretty generally, but not always.

Mr. SARGENT. That is, in the case of Michigan, where a place was left out entirely you put that in, as for instance, "Ontonagon, $25,000." That is left out of the revised estimates.

Mr. CHANDLER. There is a special report, which I have here, urgently requesting it. If the Senator desires, I will have it read.

Mr. SARGENT. No; I do not desire to have it read. I only say it is not in the revised estimates.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that an amendment moved in pursuance of an estimate from the head of a Department must mean the estimate which stands in the Senate at the time the amendment is offered; and if the Department once making a larger estimate has revised it and made a smaller one, so that to-day the Department stands before the Senate recommending only $25,000, a motion to increase it is not in order.

Mr. CHANDLER. That is the way it stands.

Mr. DAVIS. Accepting that as being the ruling of the Chair, that owing to the revised estimate being but $25,000 my amendment is ruled out of order——

Mr. WEST. Will the Senator from West Virginia yield to me for a moment to ask the Chair in regard to the construction he has put upon a recommendation by the head of a Department? It may be very important to us in the future. As I understood the Chair to say that the estimate which should be considered here as coming from the head of a Department must be the amount which is sent in under the estimates, does that render it incompetent for the head of a Department subsequently at any time during the progress of business to make an estimate and make a recommendation?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair did not state precisely what the Senator from Louisiana supposes. The Chair stated that at the time any amendment is offered under that branch of the rules its being in or out of order must depend upon what is the then existing and pending estimate of the Department, no matter what they might have estimated on a former occasion. If this morning they sent an estimate here of only $25,000 for this purpose and this evening an amendment was offered to increase it to $50,000 the amendment would not be in pursuance of the estimate.

Mr. DAVIS. I think the Chair is right in his ruling, and I submit of course; but there is one other matter which I wish to bring before the Senate. On page 17 there is a provision to survey the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal from its now terminus at Cumberland to the Ohio River. It having been provided for under the general resolution for surveys coming from the Committee on Transportation it is not necessary to have both clauses in, and the retention of the words here might lead to confusion. Therefore I move to strike out the clause in section 2, as it is imperfect.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The words proposed to be stricken out will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The words proposed to be stricken out of the second section are:

And not to exceed $5,000 of the above appropriation may be expended in continuing the exploration of routes for the extension of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal to the Ohio River, by the north and south branches of the Potomac River.

Mr. CHANDLER. I think that clause had better be stricken out.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I move the following amendment, on page 14, after line 318, to insert:

For the improvement of the harbor at Charleston, South Carolina, $18,000.

Mr. CHANDLER. That is the amount recommended in the revised estimates. I cannot object to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSTON. On page 10, line 214, I move to strike out "30" and insert "75," so as to make the appropriation "for continuing the improvement of the James River, $75,000." That is in pursuance of the revised estimates. On page 36 of the revised estimates James River is set down at $75,000. I have the revised estimates in my hand.

Mr. CHANDLER. If that is in the revised estimates it is in order, but I am afraid you are loading the bill pretty heavily.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I desire to insert "Norfolk Harbor" for a survey. On page 18, after line 90 of section 2, I move to insert:

Harbor of Norfolk, Virginia.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BOREMAN. I offer an amendment for a survey. I move on page 16, line 40 of section 2, to insert:

The Little Kanawha River below Bulltown.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. I offer the following amendment, after line 314 to insert:

For the improvement of Oakland Harbor according to the plans reported by the Government engineers, $100,000.

Mr. CHANDLER. I raise the point of order on that. It is not recommended by the engineers.

Mr. SARGENT. It is recommended by the engineers, and I hold the report in my hand. I ask the Senator not to raise the point of order on this amendment. It is the only thing that is proposed on our coast, except $25,000 thrown at us without our request. I ask the Senator not to object. He has in this bill $540,000 for his own State, and I ask for this small sum where there are, as I said before, two and a half million passengers annually traveling over this water-front and we have nothing but an insecure railroad wharf, where there is danger every day and every night of some fearful calamity happening, where there are sixty or seventy millions of treasure annually transported. I ask him not to raise a point of order that will rule this out.

Mr. CHANDLER. I must make the point of order. No notice was served.

Mr. SARGENT. That is a mistake; the notice was served. The amendment was referred to the Senator's committee, and it has been in his hands for ten days.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then I was mistaken about that; but I still make the point of order.

Mr. SARGENT. There is no ground for a point of order stated.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is a new item and not germane to anything in the bill.

Mr. SARGENT. Not germane! This is the river and harbor bill, and this amendment is for the improvement of a harbor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. WEST in the chair.) The Senator from Michigan will state his point of order.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is a new item in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inquire of the Senator from California whether the amendment is moved in pursuance of an estimate from the head of some Department?

Mr. SARGENT. Yes, sir; the estimate is made by the head of the Department. It is in pursuance of a survey ordered in the bill last year, which was carried out by the Government and a report regularly made and sent to Congress for its information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair overrules the point of order made by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. CHANDLER. I read here a short time ago that it was not recommended, but it was said "if the thing be done." It is not recommended by the head of a Department. I will ask the Senator to read the report. I had it here a short time ago.

Mr. SARGENT. It is recommended in the same way that every other item in the bill is recommended; and I say that this is the simplest justice to this great commercial want to my coast. It does not sound well for the Senator, after he fails in his point of order, to still insist on excluding this appropriation. The Senator the other day in reporting this bill boasted that the committee had not added much to it. Well, they did not add much to it. They only added $110,000, and divided $80,000 of that among the members of their own committee, and Michigan came in for $25,000, nearly one-fourth of the whole amount; Alabama for $5,000; Maryland for $10,000; Massachusetts for $10,000; Connecticut for $5,000; and Georgia for $25,000; making up $80,000 of the $110,000 in States represented by members on this committee. But when I ask simply for $100,000 for a great enterprise like this, where there is so much property and so many lives at stake, I am told it must not be allowed, and a criticism is made whether the Department is more or less warm in its recommendation for it. Here is the report in which the estimate is contained, in which the whole plan of improvement is described and the matter recommended to Congress. I ask it as a matter of justice.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask that the report be read.

Mr. SARGENT. The report is four or five pages of the book which I hold in my hand. I could not read it in my five minutes. If the Senator has anything he wants read I have no objection.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is a new item, and I raise the point of order.

Mr. SARGENT. The point of order has been overruled.

Mr. CHANDLER. This has not been recommended by the head of the Department.

Mr. SARGENT. The point of order has been decided, and I ask for a vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment stands on a question of fact, and the Chair cannot determine whether it is in pursuance of an estimate or not without seeing the estimate or hearing it read.

Mr. THURMAN. If I understand the statement of the Senator from California, an estimate was made for this work, but the Senator from Michigan says that although an estimate was made the Engineer Department or the War Department did not recommend the appropriation. That I understand to be the case from the statement of the two Senators; and that brings us to the consideration of this rule. Does this rule require that there should be a recommendation of the Department? I submit that it requires no such thing. It is sufficient that an estimate is made, and then Congress may decide whether or not to make that improvement. The object is to have the estimate, so that we may see what will be the probable cost of the work if undertaken, or so that we may see what may profitably be expended in any one year. If that estimate be made, whether there is a recommendation or no recommendation on the subject, I submit that the case comes within the rule, and it is competent to offer the amendment; and therefore, if the statement made by the Senator from California be true that this work has been estimated for, I submit that that fills the requisitions of the rule and the amendment is in order. The rule says:

Or in pursuance of an estimate from the head of some of the Departments.

It does not say "in pursuance of a recommendation" at all. It is only necessary that there should be an estimate, that Congress may see whether or not it will be advisable to enter upon that work.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The construction put by the Senator from Ohio upon the rule is confined to its exact language; but the Chair thinks that the word "estimate" in this connection means "recommendation." The object of the rule must be taken into account in construing its meaning. It was intended that the Senate should be led in this manner by the recommendation of one of the Departments or by the recommendation of one of its committees. The Departments usually state estimates and make recommendations for the estimates which they send; and although the word here is "estimate" and not "estimate and recommendation," the Chair thinks that the fair meaning of the phrase in this connection is that the amendment must be in pursuance of a recommendation of the head of a Department.

Mr. SARGENT. On that point I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the opinion of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. SARGENT. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SCOTT. How is the question raised?

Mr. SARGENT. The previous occupant of the chair ruled the amendment in order and we were discussing it as in order; and then when the honored President retook the chair the question seems to have been raised by some means again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I shall be very happy to retire until the question is settled; but while I am here I must rule as I think the law is.

Mr. SARGENT. Undoubtedly. But I was claiming stare decisis.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I shall vote for this appropriation, if it is in order, and I do not know but that it is because we have not yet heard the estimate read; it may fall within the ruling of the Chair or it may not. But I do feel bound to say for the honor of the rule that I think the judgment of the Chair is perfectly correct. We have always acted upon it, I am quite sure, hitherto that the word "estimate" in this rule has meant these estimates that are submitted to us by the Departments for appropriations which they ask or recommend to carry on the business of the Government. Then in order that the Senate should not be confined to these estimates alone it is provided that its own committees, whether the Departments choose to recommend them or not, its own organs may make the proper inquiry and make the proper recommendations. Therefore while as at present advised I sympathize with the amendment of the Senator from California and should like to vote for it, I do feel bound in the interest of the preservation of the rule for all cases to say that I do think the opinion of the Chair is perfectly correct.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That reminds the Chair that there was nothing to appeal from at the moment when the Senator from California took his appeal. The precise question here is one of fact which the present occupant of the chair has not ruled upon. A parliamentary question was put to the Chair by the Senator from Ohio. The Chair responded to that without any reference to the particular amendment under consideration; and from that opinion on a hypothetical case the Senator from California appealed, which is clearly improper. If the amendment is in pursuance of the recommendation of the head of a Department, or an estimate sent here for the purpose of being acted upon by the Senate, which is equivalent to a recommendation, then it is in order as the Chair understands. If not, it is out of order. That is a question of fact which the Chair cannot decide without being informed what the fact is.

Mr. CHANDLER. As the Senator from California has not read this, I will re-read it:

If such be the views of Congress, and if it be decided to improve the harbor of Oakland, we recommend the appropriation—

That is if Congress decided thus and so—

of the amount necessary to construct the two training walls, and dredge out a channel between them one hundred feet wide, &c.

As I said a few moments ago, this is for the benefit of a railroad which started to reach Goat Island, ran out a trestle-work bridge, and now they want the Government to spend several millions of dollars to build a harbor for that railroad.

Mr. STEWART. That is an utter mistake. My friend from Michigan has been misinformed. It is an arm of the bay extending up into Oakland where there are twenty thousand people, and the railroad has nothing to do with it. The Senator is entirely misinformed. The people of Oakland and the commerce of the country require it.

Mr. SARGENT. I call attention to the fact that the very language the Senator reads says "if Congress shall be disposed to do so and so, we recommend this appropriation."

Mr. STEWART. It is sent in regularly, as all the others are.

Mr. SARGENT. They refer in the letter of January 24 to this matter, which I have not before me, but I know they recommend it in the same way that they do everything else for which they send in estimates. Other items sent in in exactly the same way are to be found in this bill, and the Senator knows it; and the Senator knows that if it had been sent in in this shape in reference to Michigan it would have been reported immediately.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks the remark of the Senator from California is a reflection on the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not wish to reflect upon the Senator from Michigan. I simply wish to say that this bill ex officio represents two or three States, and only two or three States. Look at the members of the committee. The bill as reported from the committee only appropriated $4,000,000, and of that Michigan has $540,000, New York $531,000, Massachusetts $176,000. Gentlemen from these States are on the committee. Other States have no representation on the committee.

Mr. DAVIS. Michigan has $575,000.

Mr. SARGENT. Alabama has $100,000, Georgia $50,000, Connecticut $80,000, Maryland $80,000. All the States on the committee are very well taken care of; over a fourth of the whole amount is appropriated to them. I think I am justified in saying that if this were in one of the favored States—I will not say Michigan exactly, Wisconsin it might be; for Wisconsin is very well considered in this bill—then there would not be such a nice scrutiny of it. I suppose it is new to the Presiding Officer, it must be somewhat novel to the Chair to find how this bill provides for Wisconsin:

For continuing the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers, $300,000.

I have heard of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers in these bills ever since I have been in Congress. The Fox and Wisconsin River improvement has cost this Government millions and millions of money. Here is $300,000 in this bill, and in every bill if you look back for years past you will find from three to five hundred thousand dollars for the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers, and it will be so as long as water runs or grass grows while the control of the committees of this body is not changed. Now, let me go on:

For continuing the improvements of the harbor at Green Bay, Wisconsin, $10,000.

Will anybody say that harbor is as important as the harbor of Oakland?

Again:

For continuing the improvement of the harbor at Menomonee, Michigan and Wisconsin, $25,000.

For continuing the improvement of the harbor of refuge at the entrance of the Sturgeon Bay Canal, $10,000.

Sturgeon Bay Canal must be a very important place, and I suppose that canal is more sacred than it would be if it were a railroad.

Again, "Ontonagon," a deserted village, and left out of the revised estimates by the Department to show that it desires to dispense with an appropriation, is put in here at $23,000, in the same blessed State of Wisconsin, the Lord love it! Then—

For continuing the improvement of the harbor at Two Rivers, Wisconsin, $15,000.

For continuing the improvement of the harbor at Manitowoc, Wisconsin, $10,000.

That is a place that is unknown to the geography; at any rate to my geography. Its history is to be found, however, in river and harbor bills, or the most important incident of it.

For continuing the improvement of Sheboygan, Wisconsin, $10,000.

Lovely name! [Laughter.]

For continuing the improvement of the harbor at Port Washington, Wisconsin, $10,000.

These were all recommended by the Department in just the same manner as Oakland Harbor was recommended. The anxiety of the Department for these obscure places is marvelous. All the nice discriminations raised against me were not seen by gentlemen when there was an opportunity to put these items into this bill. Let us go on:

For continuing the improvement of the harbor at Racine, Wisconsin, $10,000.

For continuing the improvement of the harbor at Kenosha, Wisconsin, $10,000.

States so comfortably fixed may well fear to do justice to others lest this bill be overloaded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California evidently misunderstood the remark of the Chair. He did not intend to advocate this bill nor stop the Senator from California in objecting to it; but the remark he made, both in manner and tone, in the opinion of the Chair, was a reflection on the motives of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SARGENT. Very well. I do not think what I said of him reflects on him nearly as much as the bill does. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPENCER. I presume that the Senator is aware that the bill originated in the House.

Mr. SARGENT. I am, and I know who controls the committee in the House just as well as who controls the committee in the Senate.

Mr. HAMLIN. I want to say a word——

Mr. SPENCER. The chairman of the committee of the House is a gentleman from New York.

Mr. SARGENT. Yes; and New York's share in this bill I have shown. Wisconsin helps on the committee also. But what I should like to know is whether when this survey was ordered by the Government, when it was made by Government engineers, and they report as in every other case with an estimate of the cost, I am to be ruled out of order?

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the pending question?

Mr. BAYARD. What has become of the five-minute rule?

Mr. SPRAGUE. I should like to know as to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule is in full force, and the Chair now announces that the Senator from California has spoken his five minutes.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the Chair be kind enough to state to me what is the precise question before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As near as the Chair understands it, it is whether this appropriation is recommended by the department.

Mr. HAMLIN. If that be the question, then I want to say just a word or two. It is said that there are qualifying words to the recommendation in the estimates: "If Congress shall see fit to make an appropriation, then it is recommended." In my judgment these qualifying words have just no importance at all, and the appropriation stands precisely as it would stand if there were no qualifying words there. There is no distinction, there can be no distinction drawn between a naked, unqualified recommendation and one with qualifying words, because if there be an appropriation in words and terms recommended, the qualifying clause is there in our action alike in both cases. It will demand the action of the body in either case alike. The engineers recommend an appropriation, and there are no qualifying words, and it will go into the law if Congress so votes. They put the qualifying words in one case and they leave them for us in the other. You can make no distinction between the two cases; the one stands before us just like the other.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. If the construction given by the Senator from Maine be correct, then there are two or three harbors on Lake Michigan that have not been so regarded by the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Are not all these harbors provided for?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. No. I will state to the Senator from Vermont there are several cases to which the attention of the Engineer Department has been called, and in their judgment they have decided that it was not best to attempt to construct harbors at those points, and yet in like manner they have stated that if it was deemed best to construct them the estimate is so much. While stating the amount that would be necessary to construct the harbor, they at the same time give the impression that the whole judgment of the Department is that it is not feasible, it is not for the best interest of the country to do so.

I have no interest in this matter except than to be guided by the rule; we must treat one case as we do another. If this be a recommendation from the Department coming within the rule, then that qualifying word "if" has no bearing whatever upon it. If it is placed there with any point whatever, with any effect, it must be so considered. I leave it to the judgment of the Senate whether this language, stated with the qualifying "if," can be a recommendation from the Department? If that be the case, then I should like to have this bill revised, for there are some other harbors that I should like to have some appropriations provided for.

Mr. SARGENT. It is strange that any harbors have been left out if they are in Michigan. I should like to make one suggestion. It seems to me it is rather a refinement of cruelty to extend the rule by implication so as to require not only an "estimate" but a recommendation, and then when the recommendation is furnished to strain that and exclude it if it is not an unqualified recommendation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This question seems to narrow itself down to a mere question of fact. The Chair is of the opinion that if the department have made an estimate in the sense in which that word is used in this rule, then the amendment offered by the Senator from California is in order. That is a question of fact which a court would submit to a jury; and the Chair is inclined to pursue that course here and submit it to the Senate. Senators who will receive this amendment will say "ay," those opposed will say "no."

The amendment was received, there being on a division—ayes 26, noes 13.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will state that if this $100,000 is appropriated $497,000 should be appropriated. The engineers recommend $497,000.

Mr. SARGENT. I have no objection to that being done.

Mr. CHANDLER. Furthermore it means many millions of dollars; and if the Government puts its foot in it, it must complete the work for the benefit of that railroad. That railroad started for Goat Island. It got half way there and was stopped. Now they want a harbor. If the Government makes up its mind to build this harbor for the benefit of that railroad that it has donated a good many millions of dollars to, then of course the appropriation will be voted; but I hope it will not.

A good deal has been said about Michigan. Now I am not disposed to allude to California; but I will tell the Senator from California that California has had hundreds where Michigan has had dollars out of the Treasury; and what is more, she is receiving more than two dollars to one to-day for the benefit of the commerce that Michigan is receiving. Think of the subsidies to your steamships, taking money out of the Treasury daily. I do not much like this kind of slurs at the State of Michigan coming from the State of California.

Mr. SARGENT. Now, Mr. President, let me say that anything the Government does to maintain the commerce of the country upon the Asiatic seas is for the benefit of the whole country, and nobody ever thought of putting it in for the benefit of San Francisco. It is just as much for the benefit of the Western States in getting cheaper teas; it is just as much for the benefit of the Eastern States, which send their articles of merchandise for sale in China and Japan, as it is for the people of California. It is not to count in that way.

As to any donation that was ever made to the Pacific Railroads, you yourselves hold them down to pay 5 per cent. on the net proceeds of all they receive, and also to pay full interest on the amount of money which you loaned them, and you destroy one-half the value of the favor by throwing it continually in their teeth, when they are paying you as per the contract all the amount of interest on the money you exacted and are able to pay; and they will pay it to the very last cent according to contract. It was nevertheless for the benefit of the whole country and the commerce of the whole country.

I want to say to you, sir, I want to say to the Senate, that California had a right to require that the United States should construct between it and the Eastern States, across those mountains which in all the empires of the world have been barriers across which nations have fallen in pieces, have become severed, some highway by which they could get to the capital of the country without requiring them to get here by going through foreign ports and inhospitable climes, as we were formerly bound to do; and it was a great national duty to do it even if California had never returned one single cent of the amount of the money which was invested for that purpose.

Furthermore, that great highway is the means by which your goods reach the Pacific, for which we are customers, for which we send you back our gold. It is the means by which the population that comes out from your States find homes with us. It is a national accommodation; it is not a provincial thing; it is not merely for the benefit of California, it is for the benefit of the whole country; and I do not believe the country will ever see the time when it will regret what it has done in that direction for the benefit of all parts of it. But because that was done, and done I hope from proper motives, I do not think we should be denied as many rights on this floor as any other State in the Union.

Mr. STEWART. The Senator from Michigan talks about this appropriation of $100,000 not being of any use, and that it is intended for the special benefit of the railroads. If you will expend $100,000 on that Oakland bar it will enable boats to run up into the arm of the sea that is there, accommodate the people, furnish opposition ferries to the railroad, give them communication independent of the railroad, and it is universally desired by everybody there that this bar should be removed. One hundred thousand dollars would make a fine beginning toward removing that bar, and I hope it will be granted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from from California.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HAGER. I desire to say that I was instructed by the Legislature of the State of California to vote for this proposition, and shall vote according to instructions.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 28, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Bogy, Boreman, Carpenter, Clayton, Cooper, Davis, Edmunds, Flanagan, Hager, Harvey, Hitchcock, Johnston, Jones, Kelly, Mitchell, Norwood, Patterson, Pease, Ransom, Sargent, Scott, Stewart, Thurman, Tipton, West, and Windom—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Chandler, Dennis, Fenton, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, McCreery, Merrimon, Morrill of Vermont, Pratt, Sanlsbury, Spencer, Sprague, Wadleigh, Washburn, and Wright—18.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Boutwell, Brownlow, Buckingham, Cameron, Conkling, Conover, Cragin, Dorsey, Ferry of Connecticut, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Howe, Ingalls, Lewis, Logan, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Oglesby, Ramsey, Robertson, Schurz, Sherman, Stevenson, and Stockton—27.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THURMAN. I have a modest little amendment to offer to this bill. It is all I have to ask. I move to insert after line 95, on page 5, these words:

For preserving and continuing the work upon the pier at Rocky River, Ohio, $10,000.

I do not know that there will be any objection to this amendment by the chairman. If there is I will explain it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the bill, which I hope will have the approval of the chairman, on the sixth page, line 120, by striking out the word "15," and inserting "25;" so that it will read:

For continuing the improvement of the harbor at Burlington, Vermont, $25,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be considered as agreed to if there be no objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Chair will pardon me, I ought to state in justice to the Senate, although I was sure there would be no objection, that the district of Vermont carries on a commerce with Canada amounting to about $15,000,000 a year, and it collects and pays into the Treasury of customs almost $1,000,000 every year; and this is according to the revised estimates for the improvement of the harbor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be agreed to if there is no objection.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I renew the amendment which I offered some time since, and which under the ruling is now in order. There was an estimate made for the improvement. To show the importance of this improvement, which is to dredge out what is known as Arthur Kill, between Staten Island and New Jersey, I cannot do it in fewer words than by reading a notice that I see in the New York Times of this evening:

The bars that now obstruct navigation have been formed during the past eight or ten years, and the channel is so narrow that many vessels have grounded while endeavoring to get through. A number of rocks can be seen at low water. The channel is a great highway for vessels from New York, Boston, Providence, Philadelphia, Wilmington, Baltimore, and Norfolk, and General Newton considers the removal of the obstructions as important to the commerce of New York as the removal of those at Hell Gate.

I trust that this amendment will be adopted.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to give notice that as soon as this bill is disposed of, and before adjournment to-night, I shall ask the Senate to pass the bill repealing the Sanborn contract. I give the notice now so that I may not take any one by surprise.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I must object to such notices. I have charge of a bill I desire to have action upon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] to insert after line 278 the following:

That the sum of $50,000 is appropriated for the opening and improving of the channel between Staten Island and New Jersey.

The amendment was agreed to.

INSANE CONVICTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before proceeding further with the pending bill, the Chair, with the permission of the Senate, will lay before the Senate certain messages from the House of Representatives asking for committees of conference.

The Senate proceeded to consider the action of the House of Representatives on its amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 3415) to provide for the care and custody of persons convicted in the courts of the United States who have or may become insane while imprisoned.

On motion of Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

PORT OF DELIVERY AT MONTGOMERY.

The Senate proceeded to consider the action of the House of Representatives on its amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 899) to constitute Montgomery, in the State of Alabama, a port of delivery.

Mr. SPENCER. After consultation with the Committee on Commerce I move that the Senate recede from its amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

ENROLLMENT OF A BILL.

Mr. SCOTT. There is a concurrent resolution on the table to correct an omission in a bill which has passed the Senate. I will ask consent to have it acted upon now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That the Clerk of the House be authorized in enrolling the seventh Senate amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 2797) making appropriations for the payment of claims reported allowed by the commissioners of claims under the act of Congress of March 3, 1871, to insert the words "seven thousand five hundred and forty-five dollars," being the sum awarded to the party named in said amendment, said sum having been omitted from the Senate amendment as engrossed and sent to the House of Representatives.

EXTRA COMPENSATION TO PAGES.

Mr. CLAYTON. I have a little resolution for the benefit of the pages, which I should like to ask the Senate to consider.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be reported if there be no objection.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the usual per diem compensation be paid to the pages of the Senate to the 15th of July, 1874.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not right. It should be the 1st of July.

Mr. CLAYTON. Well, put it the 1st of July.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be amended to read the 1st of July, and considered as agreed to, if there be no objection.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. BOREMAN, it was Ordered, That Charles H. Day have leave to withdraw from the files of the Senate his petition and papers.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3168) making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. MITCHELL. I offer the following amendment: After line 5 of section 2, on page 14, to insert "for the purpose of ascertaining the practicability and cost of constructing canals and locks at such points." I will state that it asks no money whatever. It simply is intended to designate in regard to a particular survey.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How will that read in connection?

Mr. MITCHELL. Read the section as amended.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War is hereby directed to cause examinations or surveys, or both, to be made at the following points, namely:

Cascades and Dalles of the Columbia River, Oregon, and Washington Territory, for the purpose of ascertaining the practicability and cost of constructing canals and locks at such points.

Mr. MITCHELL. This simply designates what the survey is for.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have another amendment. On page 14, after line 6 of section 2, I move to insert:

Yam Hill River, Oregon, for removing rocks and sand-bars.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I inquire if that has been estimated for?

Mr. MITCHELL. It is simply providing for a survey. It does not appropriate anything.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I have an amendment to offer. On page 14, line 318, I move to increase the appropriation for continuing the improvement of Saginaw River from $15,000 to $50,000. I did not intend to offer this amendment, because I supposed the ruling of the Chair was to be against it; but under the revised ruling I am induced to offer it. I will state in connection with it that the committee have cut down the appropriation for Saginaw River to $15,000 when the report of the Engineer Department is $56,000. I ask that it be made $50,000; and I will state this fact, without taking up time, the commerce on the river is $22,000,000 annually. That was the amount last year

Mr. DAVIS. Where is that?

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. In Michigan.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore put the question on the amendment, and declared that the noes appeared to prevail.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I ask for a division. This is the only amendment I have asked in the bill, and I want to see if there is to be fish of one and fowl of another.

The question being put, on a division the ayes were 19 and the noes 19.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 20, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Boreman, Carpenter, Chandler, Clayton, Davis, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Harvey, Ingalls, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Spencer, Tipton, West, and Windom—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Cooper, Edmunds, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Kelly, McCreery, Merrimon, Robertson, Sargent, Saulsbury, Scott, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Thurman, Wadleigh, and Washburn—20.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Anthony, Boutwell, Brownlow, Buckingham, Cameron, Conkling, Conover, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Gilbert, Hager, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Hitchcock, Howe, Johnston, Jones, Lewis, Logan, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Ransom, Schurz, Stevenson, Stockton, and Wright—33.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PRATT. I propose to amend the pending bill on page 7, line 159, by striking out "$25,000" and inserting "$50,000;" so that the clause will read as follows:

For continuing the improvement of the Wabash River, $50,000.

The original estimate of the department for the improvement of that stream, which is the largest tributary of the Ohio River coming from the north, was $300,000, if I remember aright. It was not far from that figure. Last year $50,000 was appropriated. I strove very hard to increase it at that time to $100,000. This year the original estimate of the department was $150,000 for continuing this improvement. The revised estimate is $50,000. The committee have cut it down to $25,000. The amendment that I propose is that the revised estimate shall be substituted for the recommendation of the committee.

I will only add that when this improvement, costing less than the third of a million of dollars, is completed, a river three hundred and fifty miles in length from La Fayette to the Ohio River is made navigable for one-half the year. I hope the Senate will concur with me in this amendment and vote for it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

The question being put on the amendment, it was declared that the noes appeared to prevail.

Mr. PRATT. I will ask for the yeas and nays. ["O, no!"] This is the only thing that I have asked. It is the only appropriation made for the rivers of Indiana, and it is a small boon that I ask when it is considered that last year there was $50,000 given, and the revised estimates this year are for $50,000. The original estimate this year was for $150,000.

Mr. MITCHELL. What have the committee given you?

Mr. PRATT. Twenty-five thousand dollars. I am in earnest about this. I do not often make requests of this sort, and I am in earnest when I make them.

Several SENATORS. Take a division.

Mr. PRATT. Very well; I will ask for a division first.

The question being put, on a division the ayes were 21 and the noes 12; no quorum voting.

Mr. SPENCER. Let us have another division. There is a quorum present.

Mr. FLANAGAN, (at one o'clock and thirty-four minutes a. m. Sunday, June 21.) I move the Senate adjourn, if there is no quorum. ["No!" "No!"]

Mr. DENNIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. EDMUNDS in the chair.) Debate is not in order. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Texas that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. WEST. I desire to offer an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No amendment is in order until there is a quorum present.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Let us have another vote.

Mr. WEST. I move a call of the Senate.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. That is not necessary. There is manifestly a quorum here.

Mr. STEWART. Call the yeas and nays on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana. That will show a quorum present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will be kind enough to observe order. The Senator from Louisiana moves a call of the Senate. The question is, Will the Senate agree to the motion of the Senator from Louisiana?

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. STEWART. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BAYARD. A division will do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the motion of the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. STEWART. I call for the yeas and nays on the pending amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. PRATT,] so as to get a quorum.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 21, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bogy, Clayton, Cooper, Fenton, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Hager, Harvey, Ingalls, Mitchell, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Ransom, Schurz, Scott, Tipton, West, and Windom—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Boreman, Carpenter, Chandler, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Jones, Kelly, McCreery, Merrimon, Morrill of Vermont, Robertson, Sargent, Saulsbury, Sherman, Spencer, Stevenson, Stewart, Thurman, Wadleigh, and Washburn—24.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Anthony, Boutwell, Brownlow, Buckingham, Cameron, Conkling, Conover, Cragin, Davis, Dennis, Dorsey, Ferry of Connecticut, Gilbert, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Hitchcock, Howe, Johnston, Lewis, Logan, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Norwood, Sprague, Stockton, and Wright—28.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HAGER. I desire to offer an amendment, to insert on page 14, after line 314, the following:

For the protection of the harbor of San Diego, California, by turning the San Diego River into False Bay, $80,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary for that purpose.

Mr. President, this is in accordance with the notice I have given and in accordance with the recommendation I believe of every officer of the Government who has charge of any Department that bring harbors within their view. It has been recommended by a resolution of the Legislature of the State of California which I have here and which has been referred to the committee, by General Humphreys, by General Alexander, by Colonel Mendell, by the Coast Survey, and it is petitioned for by all the citizens living in the town of San Diego. It is the only harbor between San Francisco and Mexico, and for three hundred miles below the dividing line between California and Mexico, making a stretch of coast of about one thousand miles. It is the only natural harbor upon that whole coast.

The San Diego River having burst over its natural boundaries is now discharging into the harbor of San Diego. Formerly it discharged in the so-called False Bay; but by breaking over its boundaries it is now discharging directly into this harbor of San Diego, and that is being gradually filled up with débris, which comes down with the winter rains and from the mountains and from the sands above. It is estimated that about three hundred thousand cubic yards of sand and débris are being deposited there yearly. These officers all say that this fine harbor will be ruined unless it has protection by a barrier to divert the stream so as to throw it into the course in which it naturally and ordinarily flowed hitherto.

I have all these papers here before me and they can be read if there is any opposition to this appropriation. I was in hopes the chairman of the Committee on Commerce would assent to it, inasmuch as the recommendation came in subsequent to the committee's making their report. I will ask that the Clerk read the letters that have recently come in, if there is any desire to hear them. ["No!" "No!"] If there is no opposition, I will not require them to be read.

Mr. STEWART. I think there is no opposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California asks that a communication be read.

Mr. HAGER. Not unless the Senate desires it.

Mr. SARGENT. I hope the amendment of my colleague will be adopted.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have no doubt myself that this is a worthy appropriation. In 1602, that is two hundred and seventy-two years ago, False Bay was said to be a harbor, and the river is in the same situation now that it has been in since the acquisition of California. This river has emptied just where it does now for fifty years. I have no doubt it would be desirable to turn the river again into False Bay. In 1853 a dam was built to turn the river, but the first flood carried it away, and since 1853 it has remained in precisely the same situation. The rains in the spring wash down sand, and unquestionably in the process of ages—I cannot tell how many—it will affect the harbor; but it is in the same situation now that it has been since the acquisition of California.

Mr. HAGER. O, no; the Senator is mistaken. I have the map here.

Mr. CHANDLER. There is some filling up. I mean the river has emptied where it is now since that time. There has been some sand filled in.

Mr. HAGER. Here is the report of the Secretary of War in the Forty-second Congress in which the engineers recommend it, and say:

20. Harbor of San Diego, California.—This is the only secure harbor on our Pacific coast, south of San Francisco, for the larger sea-going vessels. It is close upon our Mexican boundary. It is to be the terminus of the Southern Pacific Railway, and is important from military considerations.

In the printed annual report from this office, of October, 1870, page 511, and in that of October, 1872, page 998, will be found a description, in detail, of the present condition of this harbor, and suggestions for its improvement.

The engineer officer in charge of the present examination, Major Mendell, repeats the recommendations made by others in the above-mentioned reports, that the best means of remedying the existing evils is the diversion of the river to its old channel into False Bay, by a dam or levee, the cost of which he estimates at $80,000.

I have a letter from the Coast Survey that shows the importance of the matter, and I have also their map showing how the bed is making out directly into the harbor, of which Captain Patterson, of the Coast Survey, being familiar with this coast, being a navigator formerly in one of the mail steamships as commander, and in the habit of entering that port, has told me that in the course of a few years perhaps it may be entirely ruined by decreasing the ebb and flow of the tide, and keep out the necessary scouring of the water at the entrance to the harbor.

I do not desire to take up the time of the Senate, but if there is any doubt about the matter I should like to have those papers read. The latest one is dated April, 1874, last April, from General Alexander, recommending this particularly, giving the details of it; and if any Senator desires the information I have it here before me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired. The Senator asks that the papers referred to by him be read.

Mr. HAGER. I do not ask for them to be read unless there is opposition.

Mr. DAVIS. I understand this is an appropriation of $80,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. HAGER. What is the objection?

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Senator from West Virginia whether he thinks it is worth while for us to waste time on these amendments? I can assure him all these amendments will be dropped, as a matter of course. At this period of the session, in all human probability, efforts to get amendments on this bill will not amount to much, even if they succeed. I appeal to the good sense of my friend from West Virginia not to make a debate on an amendment of this kind.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from California.

The question being put, a division was called for; and the ayes were 16, and the noes 19; no quorum voting.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HAGER. Now I desire to say just a few words.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. HAGER. But I have a second time, have I not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is not entitled to be heard without leave of the Senate.

Mr. HAGER. I ask the Senate to allow me just three minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California asks unanimous consent to speak three minutes longer on his amendment. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HAGER. This, as I have already stated, is a natural harbor, not an artificial harbor. We ask no appropriation for building a breakwater or any artificial harbor. You are in the habit of spending millions of dollars for the purpose of making artificial harbors, and yet here is one prepared by nature which is being allowed to be destroyed for the want of an appropriation of a few thousand dollars. This opposition seems to me the most astonishing thing in the world. Every Department of the Government, as I have stated and I have the documents before me to prove it, is in favor of this appropriation, recommending it for the preservation of a natural harbor, the only one in a distance of one thousand miles; and yet you allow it to be destroyed entirely for the want of a small appropriation. Millions are being expended, as I have said, for artificial harbors, for breakwaters along the coast, and yet you decline on this occasion to make an appropriation to preserve a harbor which nature has provided for you.

If, under these circumstances, as I have stated them, with the recommendations I have from the War Department, from the engineers, and from the Coast Survey, recommending this very appropriation and this very important improvement—if after all that has been done here this night this proposition is defeated, of course I shall have to submit to the decision of the Senate.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 24, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bogy, Clayton, Cooper, Fenton, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hager, Ingalls, Johnston, Jones, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Oglesby, Pratt, Ramsey, Sargent, Schurz, Scott, Stevenson, Stewart, Thurman, Tipton, West, and Windom—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bayard, Boreman, Boutwell, Carpenter, Chandler, Davis, Ferry of Michigan, Hamilton of Maryland, Hitchcock, McCreery, Merrimon, Pease, Saulsbury, Sherman, Spencer, Wadleigh, and Wright—18.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Brownlow, Buckingham, Cameron, Conkling, Conover, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Connecticut, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Harvey, Howe, Kelly, Lewis, Logan, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Norwood, Patterson, Ransom, Robertson, Sprague, Stockton, and Washburn—31.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BOREMAN, (at two o'clock a. m.) I move the Senate adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move to amend the bill by inserting after line 9 of section 1:

To continue the construction of the breakwater at Du Luth, $10,000.

Mr. President, there is an estimate for that, and there is a great necessity for it. Some time since the Government to protect the commerce of Du Luth constructed a breakwater, but owing to the storms which prevailed in these high latitudes and on that elevated water the greater part of it was swept away. It was erected mainly for the protection of the depot and the entrance to the railroad station, and the elevator which cost about $150,000. There is really about $300,000 worth of property protected by this breakwater. Carried away as it was by the storms, I think it is the duty of the Government to reconstruct it, and this is the small allowance we ask for to do that.

If we supposed Congress would be more liberal we should ask for more, as there is a necessity for more; but we shall be content with this much to carry us through the summer, when this work can be done and great protection offered to commerce.

If any gentleman supposes there is no occasion for this he is very much mistaken. If he supposes there is no trade at Du Luth he is much mistaken. They shipped from that port over three million bushels last year, say one hundred thousand barrels of flour. Although the town has been joked upon, it is a city of five thousand inhabitants, built in three or four years.

Mr. CLAYTON. I wish to ask where this improvement is to be made?

Mr. RAMSEY. At the city of Du Luth, on Lake Superior; and I will say that this is the only appropriation, in addition to barely $10,000 for the inner harbor, for the whole of that lake in Minnesota, and about one hundred and fifty or one hundred and sixty miles of its coast are within our State. This is the only harbor on that lake in Minnesota for which any appropriation is made. I hope there will be no reluctance on the part of the Senate in giving me this.

Mr. SPENCER. Before voting on this question I should like to have read for the information of the Senate the speech of J. Proctor Knott, of Kentucky. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAMSEY. What would the Senator prove by that?

Mr. SPENCER. It is a long time since I read it, and I wish the Senate to hear it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota.

The amendment was rejected—ayes 17, noes not counted.

Mr. WEST. I desire to offer an amendment on page 16, which I understand from the chairman of the Committee on Commerce will not be objected to. It is merely requiring a survey. The amendment I offer is on page 16, to insert at the bottom of that page, after line 57 of section 2, the words:

The Red River at Alexandria, Louisiana.

It will probably cost $100 to make the survey.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY. I give notice that as soon as this bill is disposed of I want the Senate to consider the post-route bill.

Mr. FENTON. I desire to offer an amendment to come in at the end of the one hundredth line, in the appropriation for the harbor at Buffalo, New York:

And the Secretary of War is authorized to remove and prevent accumulations of sand at the entrance of said harbor: Provided, The same can be done without expense or liability against the United States.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to,

Mr. BOUTWELL. I propose an amendment to come in after line 301. It is an amendment which the committee would have agreed to if the rule in the committee had not been so firm, but it has been departed from by the Senate. It is a proper appropriation for which estimates have been made by the department. It is very small but very important. I should not have offered it except under the practice of the Senate. It is to insert after line 301:

For removing bowlders from the Merrimac River, near the city of Newburyport, Massachusetts, $6,000.

The amendment was rejected—ayes 14, noes not counted.

Mr. MITCHELL. I offer the following amendment after line 310, on page 14, insert:

For constructing a canal to connect the waters of the Coquille River, Oregon, with the waters of the Coos Bay, Pacific Ocean, $100,000.

I desire to state that at the last session of Congress a survey was ordered and the report has been favorable, and I ask for an appropriation.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DENNIS. I offer the following amendment merely for the survey of a harbor; it is offered with the approbation of the Committee on Commerce. After line 90 of section 2 I move to insert:

Survey of the harbor of Crisfield, Somerset County, Maryland, with a view to remove obstructions.

Mr. BAYARD. Is that amendment open to amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. BAYARD. I will not offer any, for it is not required.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that this order be entered with the bill:

Ordered, That the river and harbor appropriation bill be printed, with the Senate amendments numbered consecutively.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN D. YOUNG.

Mr. STEVENSON. I ask the Senate to take up House bill No. 3772. It gives to one of my colleagues in the other House the balance of pay which the House voted to him, and the resolution for which I have on my table, and which the Clerk cannot pay him for want of funds. It is a bill (H. R. No. 3772) for the relief of John D. Young, of Kentucky.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think it extremely desirable that we should have an executive session for a few minutes.

Mr. STEVENSON. Let this bill pass.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This will be the unfinished business when we open the doors. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was not agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 18, noes 30.

The bill (H. R. No. 3772) for the relief of John D. Young, of Kentucky, was read. It appropriates $1,009 to pay to John D. Young the difference between the sum of $2,509 ordered to be paid him by a resolution of the House of Representatives passed February 15, 1869, and the sum of $1,500 which was paid him by order of the Committee on Accounts on the 5th day of April, 1869.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Has the bill been taken up?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair considers it so.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I shall be glad to have the question taken upon that point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will submit the question to the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to inquire of the Chair, if I am not out of order, whether this bill is reported from a committee, and what committee, and when?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It came from the House of Representatives to-night and has not been referred.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then it requires unanimous consent, I believe. I should like to hear the Senator from Kentucky read the order of the House, or whatever it is, to see whether I object or not.

Mr. STEVENSON. Here it is:

Mr. NIBLACK. I offer the following resolution, which is approved by the Committee on Elections, and demand the previous question:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to John D. Young, out of the contingent fund of the House, the sum of $2,500 for his expenses in prosecuting his claim to a seat in the House of Representatives for the ninth congressional district of Kentucky.

That resolution passed by ayes 101, noes 60. Mr. Young applied to the Clerk and got $1,500, the receipt for which and the certificate of the Clerk as to which are before me. He cannot get the balance because the Clerk has no money to pay it, and this bill is to give him the balance of that which was due him under this resolution of the House.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the Senator read the certificate of the Clerk.

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes, sir.

The books of the office show that there was paid April 15, 1869, to John D. Young the sum of $1,500 for expenses in contesting a seat in the Fortieth Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kentucky to proceed to the consideration of this bill.

The question being put, there was one negative vote.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is an objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill must be laid aside.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did not vote no; I make no objection.

Mr. STEVENSON. I desire to know what Senator voted against it?

Mr. WADLEIGH. I voted against it. There are many bills on this Calendar which should pass, and I do not conceive that this bill has any preference over those.

Mr. STEVENSON. It will not take a minute. I appeal to the Senator from New Hampshire to withdraw his objection as a matter of courtesy to me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire withdraw his objection.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I withdraw it.

The bill was read three times, and passed.

PRE-EMPTION AND HOMESTEAD ENTRIES.

Mr. HARVEY. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3250) to confirm pre-emption and homestead entries of public lands within the limits of railroad grants in cases where such entries have been made under the regulations of the Land Department, to report it back without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

Mr. THURMAN. I ask unanimous consent to move that when the Senate adjourns it adjourn to meet on Monday at ten o'clock.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; there is no necessity for that. The regular hour will do. I have consulted about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. HARVEY] asks for the consideration of the bill just reported by him. Is there objection?

Mr. EDMUNDS. We passed a bill of that kind to-day. We ought to have a chance to look at it.

Mr. STEWART. I think it ought to be examined.

Mr. WRIGHT. I trust the Senator from Nevada will not object. Let the bill be read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object to the consideration of the bill until we hear what it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

REPEAL OF SANBORN CONTRACT LAW.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to call up House bill No. 3256. It will take but a moment. There is an amendment to it which requires it to go back to the House. It is the bill to repeal the Sanborn contract law.

Mr. BAYARD. I hope there will be no objection to that.

The bill (H. R. No. 3256) to repeal so much of the act approved May 8, 1872, entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1873, and for other purposes," as provides for the employment of persons to assist the proper officers of the Government in discovering and collecting moneys withheld, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment of the Committee on Finance was to strike out section 3.

Mr. SHERMAN. That section is a long penal section, prohibiting certain acts by members of Congress—the substance of the present law. We did not think it necessary to repeat the present law in this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not rise to debate this bill, and I suppose I shall vote for it; but I wish to take this occasion, by way of debate, to say to the Senate that the Attorney-General has sent a communication to me saying that it is of the first importance that we should pass at this session of Congress a bill for the enforcement of law in Utah. The Judiciary Committee have also committed that subject to my charge. It is a matter of no personal interest to me whether the Senate pass the bill or not. As soon as that subject is mentioned, however, I know that with a great many it is looked upon as if there was a case of persecution or an unpleasant subject to take up. The fact is the bill as it passed the House is, you may say, only for the enforcement of law. The Attorney-General in his communication says the courts are all stopped in that Territory. I would say further that since the bill came into the hands of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate they have modified it so that there is nothing of it but simply a bill to open the courts of that Territory. I think, if the Senate will give me an opportunity that they may hear the bill, it will lead to no debate and will commend itself to the approval of the Senate. I make this statement now while the Senate can hear it, so that when I do move that bill they may decide whether they wish to legislate upon that subject or not.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

COURTS IN ALABAMA.

Mr. SPENCER. I desire to make a brief statement to the Senate, and I hope I shall have its attention.

We are in an unfortunate condition in the State of Alabama in regard to our courts. In the northern and middle districts of Alabama there is no circuit court jurisdiction. The Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives have to-day agreed to report articles of impeachment of the United States district judge. We have had no courts in Alabama for over a year, and in the northern district, in which I live, for nearly two years. We shall be without any courts during the present summer and fall unless we can procure the passage of the bill which the Judiciary Committee have reported. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2246) relating to circuit courts of the United States for the districts of Alabama.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on the Judiciary proposed to amend the bill by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting:

That hereafter there shall be but one circuit court of the United States in and for the district of Alabama, to be known as the circuit court of the district of Alabama, which shall be held at the city of Montgomery, in said State, and commence on the first Monday in June annually. The said circuit court shall have and exercise in and for the said district of Alabama the same original powers and jurisdiction as are or may be conferred by law upon the circuit courts of the United States; and shall have and exercise appellate and revisory jurisdiction over the decrees, judgments, and proceedings of the district courts of the United States for the southern and northern districts as well as the middle district, of Alabama, under the laws of the United States regulating the jurisdiction, powers, and practice of the circuit courts, and the judges thereof, in cases removed into said court by appeal or writ of error; and the said court, and the judges thereof, shall have the general supervision and jurisdiction in all cases and questions arising in said districts, respectively, under the second section of the act approved March 2, 1867, entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States."

SEC. 2. That all civil causes, actions, suits, executions, pleas, process, and other proceedings now pending in said district courts of the United States for the southern and northern districts of Alabama, which might have been brought, and would have been originally cognizable in a circuit court, are hereby declared to be transferred to the circuit court of the district of Alabama; and the clerks of said district courts shall transmit all the original papers in such causes, and a complete transcript of all the dockets, minutes, orders, judgments, and decrees in such causes as the same appear of record in said district courts to said circuit court of the United States at Montgomery, Alabama; and the said circuit court shall have as full, complete, and ample jurisdiction to proceed, hear, try, and determine said causes thus transferred, and to do any and all acts, and make any and all orders in relation to such records and papers, as if said causes had been commenced originally in said court.

SEC. 3. That all acts and parts of acts contravening the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. GOLDTHWAITE. I wish to offer a substitute for the bill reported by the committee. It is the bill passed by the House.

Mr. SPENCER. My colleague I think is mistaken in offering a substitute. He desires to have the Senate disagree to the amendment of the committee, so that we shall pass the House bill as it came to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will accomplish his purpose by voting against the amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. WRIGHT. There were several bills referred to the Judiciary Committee on this subject and upon the examination of the entire question the committee concluded to recommend the amendment which has just been read. I think it is well, before the Senate vote upon this question finally, that we have the House bill read, and then we can understand the question that is involved here.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The House bill will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That there shall be, and is hereby, established a circuit court of the United States for the middle district of Alabama, as said district is now constituted by law, to be held in the city of Montgomery, and a like court for the northern district of Alabama, as said district is now constituted by law, to be held in the city of Huntsville.

SEC. 2. That said circuit courts shall have and exercise, within their respective districts, the same original powers and jurisdiction as are or may be conferred by law upon the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of Alabama at Mobile, and shall have and exercise appellate and revisory jurisdiction over the decrees and judgments of the district courts of the United States for the said middle and northern districts, respectively, under the laws of the United States regulating the jurisdiction, powers, and practice of the circuit courts, and the judges thereof, in cases removed into said courts by appeal or writ of error; and said courts, and the judges thereof, shall have the general superintendence and jurisdiction over all cases and questions arising in said district courts, respectively, under the act approved March 2, 1867, entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," as is provided for in the second section of said act.

SEC. 3. That there shall be appointed for each of said circuit courts for said middle and northern districts by the circuit judge of the circuit a clerk, who shall take the oath and give the bond required by law of clerks of circuit courts, and who shall discharge all the duties and be entitled to all the fees and emoluments prescribed by law for clerks of circuit courts; and the United States marshals for said middle and northern districts shall respectively act as marshals for said circuit courts, and the United States district attorney for said districts shall discharge the duties of district attorney in said circuit courts for said middle and northern districts.

SEC. 4. That the clerks of said district courts for said middle and northern districts shall transfer to the clerks of the said circuit courts respectively all the original dockets, records, and files of papers in all common law and equity causes which might have been brought and would have been originally cognizable in a circuit court, and which were either disposed of or pending in said district courts while the same were vested with circuit-court powers.

SEC. 5. That the circuit court of the United States held at Mobile, Alabama, shall be designated and known as the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of Alabama; and its appellate and revisory power, upon appeal or writ of error, or by bill or petition, or otherwise, under the second section of said act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," is hereby restricted to judgments and decree rendered or causes and questions arising in the district court of the United States for said southern district; and that the fourth section of the act approved March 3, 1873, entitled "An act relating to the circuit and district courts of the United States for the middle and northern districts of Alabama," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

SEC. 6. That terms of the circuit and district courts for the several districts of Alabama shall be held as follows: For the southern district, the terms of the circuit and district courts shall commence on the fourth Monday of December and the first Monday of June in each year; for the middle district, on the first Monday of May and the first Monday of November in each year; for the northern district, on the first Monday of April and the second Monday of October in each year.

SEC. 7. That the fifth section of the act approved February 22, 1838, entitled "An act to abolish the circuit court at Huntsville, in the State of Alabama, and for other purposes," and the act approved August 4, 1842, entitled "An act to regulate appeals and writs of error from the district court of the United States for the northern district of Alabama," be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

SEC. 8. That all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. WRIGHT. When this bill was first before the Judiciary Committee the question was whether we should give to the State of Alabama more than one place for holding the circuit court. It was determined at that time that there should be but one place, and that should be Mobile, and we reported the bill back accordingly, the opinion of the committee being that it was not advisable that there should be three places of holding court in the State of Alabama. In other words, that it was not necessary that there should be a circuit court in each one of the districts of Alabama. We regarded that the expense attending upon these three courts was such that we could not at this time well afford to recommend it, and we reported the bill accordingly. Upon the suggestion of the Senators from Alabama we changed that recommendation, the bill being recommitted, and recommended that a court be held for the State at Montgomery, the capital of the State. The amendment of the committee is that there be one circuit court for the State of Alabama, to be held at Montgomery, having jurisdiction throughout the entire State, instead of at Mobile, as at first recommended, there being three district courts still held in that State.

The bill as passed the House, as I understand it, provides that there shall be three places of holding the circuit court in Alabama. It is for the Senate to determine whether there shall be one place of holding court at Montgomery or whether there shall be three places. I suggest to the Senators from Alabama that if that is not sufficient, then it will be better for them to propose an amendment, so that there shall be two places of holding court, at Mobile and at Montgomery, if it is desirable that there shall be a court held at Mobile; but the committee were of the impression and still entertain the opinion that it is not advisable under the circumstances that there shall be three places of holding court in the State of Alabama. That is the question which is presented. We have recommended that there be one place, and that the capital, for holding the circuit court, and three districts each having a district court. We think this is about the same that is found in other States; but we know that as the House bill stands it provides that there shall be additional clerks provided in each one of these districts.

Mr. SPENCER. I beg pardon.

Mr. WRIGHT. As I remember the House bill, it proposes that there shall be a clerk appointed in the northern and central districts, and that there shall be a marshal also who shall discharge the duties in these districts, and courts shall be held there, and that necessarily increases the expense of holding the courts. The committee have made this recommendation, and it is for the Senate to determine whether there shall be a court held in each one of these places under the circumstances.

Mr. SPENCER. The bill as passed by the House of Representatives was drawn by Judge Wood, the present circuit judge of that circuit. There are already three districts in Alabama. There are two marshals, one for the northern and middle districts, and one for the southern district; there are two district attorneys, and there are three clerks of the courts.

This bill will, in my opinion, add not one dollar to the expenses of the United States. The bill is agreed upon by the entire delegation from Alabama in the House and in the Senate. The entire delegation are unanimous. I have in my hand a telegram from the bar of Mobile. I have in my desk letters from the bar all over the State asking the passage of the bill as it passed the House.

Every one knows that if the bill fails now we shall lose it entirely. Any amendment will be fatal to it. I hope the amendment of the Senate committee will be voted down and the bill passed as it came from the House of Representatives.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am not much surprised at the speech of the Senator from Alabama. We had considered this bill in the Judiciary Committee as many other bills of a similar character, faithfully, and we thought, knowing what the business of these courts in Alabama is from the official returns, that there was no just excuse for increasing the court facilities there at all.

Mr. STEVENSON. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, I will state that we have not any courts in Alabama.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think I understand the whole subject quite as well as the Senator does, if he will pardon me. I do not know whether they have had courts in fact in Alabama or not. That is a subject which Congress cannot provide for. We cannot make judges do their duty and we cannot get rid of judges by any action of our own independently whom people have got appointed there. But I was saying that carefully considering this bill and other similar bills, the committee were of opinion that the amount of public business as shown by the official returns in that State would not justify any increase of expenses whatever or increase of the places of holding courts. Then the question was whether we should provide that this circuit court (which by implication of law now I think extends over the whole State, but to save the possible question we are willing to provide for that at any rate) should be held at Mobile or Montgomery. It was finally determined, I believe with the concurrence of one of the Senators from Alabama at any rate, that if only one place was to be fixed, Montgomery was the proper one as being the center of the State. Of course the people of Mobile do not like that. They want a circuit court where they have it now. The people of Montgomery want to have a court there; the people of Huntsville want a court there; and so on; but the United States, as we thought, is not justified in putting the circuit court on wheels and running it around over a State where there is nothing to do. In the middle and northern districts of Alabama the circuit court business is practically nothing at all, as the returns show.

Now, if the committee has done its duty to the Senate and to the country in recommending what is right and resisting what is wrong for the public interests in the regulation of the courts of the United States in that State, certainly the Senate ought to stand by this report. If on the other hand the Senate think that provision ought to be made for having a United States court wherever the people of a locality demand one—and they will demand one in every county as fast as they find they can have one—then the committee ought to be overruled and you ought to give these gentlemen all the courts they ask for. That is the simple question. We have no interest against Alabama, quite the reverse; but having all the official information before us as to what the necessities of the case were and what would justify the expense of holding additional terms and so on, we felt obliged unanimously to report——

Mr. STEVENSON. Not unanimously.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I beg pardon of the Senator; I believe it was not a unanimous report; I think one member of the committee was in favor of something more. I withdraw the observation. I had forgotten the circumstance. We made this report then.

Now I wish to ask the Senate, in the interest of the administration of justice and of securing the Treasury and of keeping the circuit courts of the United States within some bounds, to agree to this amendment recommended by the committee, and then I shall have no objection to the passage of the bill although, as I say, we strained a point in doing anything about it except as to the question of jurisdiction.

Mr. STEVENSON. I have been constrained to differ with the committee, a thing I rarely do, and I desire briefly to state the reasons for that difference. I was the only member of the committee who differed from the majority.

The first ground I take is that the Senators and Representatives of a State know what their wants are, and if there is no increased expense it is the duty of the Senate to yield their assent. When a united representation in the other House and a united representation here say to us "The necessities of the State demand that we shall have three places for holding our courts, and we ask it as a local matter without increasing the expense," I think it ought to be granted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But you do increase the expense every time.

Mr. STEVENSON. In the next place it appears that the circuit judge himself drew this bill. He knew very well what the necessities of the State were. I have great sympathy for the people of Alabama, a State in which I never was, but I know some little about its situation. It is very much like Kentucky. I believe that we have three places of holding our courts and the distances between them are not near as great as the distances in Alabama are. In addition to that, from Hunstville to Montgomery is two hundred and fifty miles and you have to cross a chain of mountains to go from one to the other. In the impoverished condition of that people, I think that it is a hardship rarely presented to the Senate to deny them the privilege of having a court where they have held it heretofore, where there will be no additional clerk, no additional marshal, and where the people can enjoy the benefit of justice without being put to the expense of two hundred and fifty miles' travel over the mountains from Huntsville to Montgomery.

Then again it is impossible to know what the business will be until you have the court, and they have not enjoyed the benefit of courts for some time.

Mr. SPENCER. For two years.

Mr. STEVENSON. For over two years the Senator from Alabama tells me.

Mr. SPENCER. At Huntsville.

Mr. STEVENSON. Now, sir, in view of all these circumstances and in view of the action of Congress at this session in dividing the State of Louisiana into two judicial districts, is it not a hardship for the Senate to overrule the wishes of the Senators and the wishes of a united representation in the other House from Alabama when what they ask involves no increased cost and has the indorsement of the judge himself? It does seem to me that it makes the strongest appeal I have heard, and therefore I was constrained to differ from the committee and I hope the Senate will grant what is requested.

Mr. GOLDTHWAITE. When I understood that the House bill was before the committee, I immediately went to the chairman, for it is a matter in which the people of Alabama, suffering as they have done for many years under the infliction of an unjust and incompetent judge, feel a deep interest. I went to the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, and I found to my surprise that a bill was to be reported providing for but one place of holding a circuit court in Alabama, and that at Mobile or Montgomery. It is true as I informed him that I reside at Montgomery, and it is true also that I did say to him that if the court was located at Montgomery I would receive more benefit from it than I would if it was located at any other point, I told him at the same time that it was in every respect unjust that Alabama, extending from the Gulf of Mexico to the Tennessee line, upward of five hundred miles, that had from the time of its organization as a State been recognized as in three divisions, South Alabama, Middle Alabama, and North Alabama, should be allowed only one circuit court. I told him that it was a matter upon which the entire bar of the State were agreed, so far as they were concerned, that the House bill was drawn at the request of the circuit judge, of whom not one single citizen of Alabama has a right to complain; that it was his wish and the universal wish of the bar and the wish of the people. For a million of people, which is the population of Alabama, to be called upon to go to but one court in the center of the State, would necessarily operate to increase the expenditures to which the people would be subjected by causing the court to continue longer than it would under different circumstances. It is not in accordance with the existing recognition of the people of Alabama dividing their State into three distinct and separate districts, which has been the case from 1819 when it was admitted into the Union.

We have had one district court at Mobile, one at Montgomery, and one also in Huntsville; but, sir, we have now no wish for our district courts. This is owing to the incompetency of the judge who has presided over them, so long an infliction on Alabama which but few States have endured.

So far as the bill is concerned, I understand that there is but one objection to it on the part of the committee, and that is that it increases the expenses. Now, we have a circuit judge who is to hold each of these circuit courts. We have two marshals who, under the bill as proposed by the House, will attend to the three districts. So there is no judge to provide for, there are no marshals to provide for. The only officers of the court that are left are the clerks, and the clerks are paid according to the fee bill by fees alone. So that really, with the marshals and the judge, and the clerks paid from their own fee bills as framed by law, I do not see how there can be one single dollar of expense to the United States. And when the measure proposed is in accordance with the wish of the entire people of Alabama, when not a single member of the bar is arrayed against it, and it involves no expense whatever to the Government, it would seem to me strange that it should be denied to that people under such circumstances.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It is very clear, I think, that this bill will not pass to-night. A suggestion was made by the Senator from Iowa that an amendment might be prepared providing for two courts, as they have two marshals. This bill for three I do not believe will pass without a great deal of discussion. But at all events I feel it my duty now to move to postpone this bill and proceed to the consideration of the bill for the enforcement of law in Utah.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey moves to postpone the pending bill and proceed to consider the Utah bill, so called.

Mr SARGENT, (at two o'clock and fifty-two minutes a. m.) I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to, there being on a division—ayes 15, noes 24.

Mr. SPENCER. I hope we shall now have a vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SPENCER. I appeal to the Senator from New Jersey to withdraw his motion until we get a vote on this bill. It will relieve the people of Alabama very much.

Mr. STEWART. I hope the Senator will accept the Judiciary Committee's amendment and take the chance of having it acted on in the other House.

Mr. SPENCER. That is asking something very unfair. I am willing to take a vote of the Senate and abide by the decision of the Senate without any further debate.

Mr. STEWART. I fear you will get nothing unless you take the Judiciary Committee's amendment. The House will act on it at once.

Mr. SPENCER. I do not think at this hour anybody wants to debate the question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It will certainly have to be debated until it is fairly understood. I do not intend to commit this country, with the number of similar demands there are from sundry States to put the circuit court of the United States on wheels to run into every county, without the Senate fully understanding the subject, so that at the next session (if you are to leave it to the citizens of each State to say how many courts they shall have) we shall be relieved of the trouble of settling the question. If you want to turn everything into the Federal jurisdiction, to overthrow all the State courts and invite everybody to sue in the Federal courts everywhere, and double the expenses of the Treasury, then of course you can begin where the Senator from Alabama wants you to begin, by putting the courts in that State on wheels and carrying them into every section of the State, when from the state of business in that State, as everybody knows, it is not once in a long while that anything except a criminal case (which can be tried in the district court) would arise in the northern part of that State. You do enough when you give to that State, whose business, as I say, in the circuit court is so limited, a circuit court either at Mobile or Montgomery, just as the Senators say, for we left it to them to choose their place, and they said if they could have had but one, and not three as they preferred, they thought the public interests required them to agree on Montgomery.

I repeat if the Senator wishes to say that instead of acting upon sound principles about this business and independent of local wishes you are to turn this subject over to the various States through their representatives to determine for themselves according to local pressure how many circuit courts they will have, then the committee wish to know it fairly on discussion and we will report the rest of the bills according to the wishes of the various Senators and let the Treasury take care of itself. If on the other hand you are to act upon this bill on the principle that upon a careful investigation of what the public good imperatively demands, and as far as the public good will allow you to go, then I wish the Senate to stand by the careful consideration of the committee and give to these people all the court that ends of justice and such conveniences as other States, like New York and Ohio and so on have, require.

But, Mr. President, I do not want at this present stage, when another motion is pending, to take the time of the Senate to discuss this; but we have got to meet this responsibility, and meet it fairly upon its merits, without regard to the special wishes of my friend from Alabama. We have to act upon different ground. If this maatter is to be debated I will send down to the committee-room and get the documents and reports and show the Senate how much circuit-court business there is in Alabama, so that we shall vote understandingly.

Mr. SPENCER. I cannot help saying and believing that the Senator from Vermont is very harsh and very unjust. We have no district court in Alabama. If there was a district court in Alabama we should be perfectly willing to accept the committee's report.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let me state to my friend that that is a temporary inconvenience, because you have a judge who you think is not a good one. Perhaps he is not; I have no right to pronounce any opinion.

Mr. SPENCER. He does not hold court, and the Judiciary Committee of the House have agreed on a resolution of impeachment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no right to say anything about that. I only point out to the Senate from the Senator's own statement that what they demand here is a regularly organized tribunal in three or four places in the State because for the moment you happen to have a judge that you do not like or who does not do his duty. The circuit judge has a right to order into any one of these districts any other district judge if this man does not do his duty, and the business can be disposed of. The Senator has forgotten that.

Mr. SPENCER. I have not forgotten that. Being forced to do it, I will accept the committee's amendment rather than endanger losing the bill entirely. I will accept the committee's amendment. I do it, however, under protest.

Mr. GOLDTHWAITE. What did I understand my colleague to say?

Mr. SPENCER. That we would accept the amendment of the committee rather than lose the bill.

Mr. GOLDTHWAITE. I should rather lose the bill. It would be rank injustice so far as the people of Alabama are concerned, to bring them from the Tennessee line to the center of the State, and from the Gulf to the center of the State. It is contrary to the wishes of the people. It is contrary to the recognized course of the people. So far as Alabama is concerned she has universally from the time of her admission down to the present hour, recognized three principal divisions of the State, and conformed her judicial proceedings with relation to those divisions. Now, there is not five dollars or certainly not fifty dollars a year to be lost to the Government by this; and every member of the bar, and the entire delegation so far as Alabama is concerned, and the people of Alabama, are for the House bill. It appears to me most singular that Alabama should be denied what her people, her bar, and her circuit judge desire to have.

Mr. SPENCER. If my colleague will allow me a moment, I will state to him, as that he is aware—and I wish the Senate to understand it—that at the present time in two-thirds of the State, in the northern and middle districts, there is no circuit court jurisdiction, and there is no Federal jurisdiction unless this bill passes in some shape. Hence I am willing to take the amendment of the committee rather than to be for the next six months in Alabama without any court.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will put the question on the amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. EDMUNDS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am sorry to hear the warm remarks of the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. GOLDTHWAITE,] appealing to the enthusiasm of the Senate to do a particular act for him because his people demand it. Let me tell the Senator, so that there shall be no misunderstanding about this, that the districts of Middle and Northern Alabama never had a circuit court in their lives. The district courts have had circuit-court jurisdiction until within a year or so when, on account of the misconduct of the judge and at the request of Senators from Alabama themselves, we consented to withdraw the circuit-court jurisdiction from those two northern districts of the United States, because they did not wish to have it reposed in the judge. They stated that there was scarcely any circuit-court business there, and he having circuit-court powers was enabled to practice tyranny on the people, it was claimed. We yielded to that demand and withdrew the circuit-court jurisdiction and conferred it, as the act of Congress intended to do, upon the circuit-court judge, embracing the whole State. My opinion is now that that is the effect of the act; but there is a doubt about it; and now they come to us and say "We want that doubt removed." "Very well," we say, "we will remove the doubt." "Then" they say "we want two independent circuit courts set up that have never been set up in the States before in all its history," and which as I say referring to the reports of business existing for a long series of years have no occasion, so far as the interests of business are concerned, to exist at all.

What are the jurisdictions of the circuit court? The district court has criminal jurisdiction concurrent with the circuit court in all cases that arise up there. Then, when you come to civil jurisdiction, it is between citizens of different States, and you find that there is no commerce in that part of the country sufficient to require a large resort to Federal courts; and when you come even to the southern part of the State, the state of its business at this time, and has been for a long time, is such that the amount of proper Federal jurisdiction for the circuit court is not enough to keep one judge for two months in the whole year. That is the fact about it. There are cases in bankruptcy, it is true; there are cases of internal-revenue violations, over both of which the district courts have proper jurisdiction.

I repeat that the circuit judge can now without any law, if this judge does not do his duty in these districts, assign any other judge to go there from town to town and hold the district courts now provided by law. In the face of this, when in the State of New York, having three million inhabitants, their courts are still farther apart by a long distance than those proposed in the State of Alabama, it is said that you shall set up two distinct circuit courts to accommodate the wishes of that people.

As I said before, I have demanded the yeas and nays in order that the committee may be guided in their action upon other bills by the action of the Senate upon this. If the rule is to be adopted that the wishes of Senators and members on the subject are to be the guide of action, then the Judiciary Committee will of course cheerfully return to the Senate, according to the wishes of the various Senators, the dozen or two bills involving a million or two of expense which are before us creating fresh circuits and fresh places of holding courts, and all that sort of thing; and we will take it as the rule that the wishes of the Senators, pushed up by the people who want more terms and more offices, are to be the guide. If, on the other hand, the condition of business, the state of the Treasury, and the history of the transactions that we have had before in reference to these matters are to be the guide, then I do submit to the Senate that, however much we may wish to oblige our friends from Alabama, as I certainly should be glad to do as they know, we ought to stand by the committee and do what we have recommended to be done. That is all I have to say.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I cannot help thinking that my friend, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, exaggerates the importance of this bill. It creates no new district. Three districts exist in Alabama already, and have ever since 1819, I believe. I do not think there is any great increase; and now if there is any State in the Union in which a circuit court is not held in every district in the State, with perhaps the exception of the eastern district of New York, I am not acquainted with it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator ought to remember that there is really only one district in the whole of Alabama. It was divided at the request of Senators into three places of holding courts, but there is only one district and one judge. It is subdivided.

Mr. THURMAN. It amounts to the same thing. There are practically three districts; and I say again I do not know a single State in the Union which is divided into districts in which a circuit court is not held in each district except—and I am not sure of that—in the case of the eastern district of New York, which is just across the East River, consisting of Long Island, if that be an exception.

Mr. WRIGHT. The State of Iowa is precisely like the State of Alabama; it has but one district judge and four places of holding the district court; and we have but one place of holding the circuit court in the State of Iowa.

Mr. THURMAN. How many district judges?

Mr. WRIGHT. One district judge as they have in Alabama, and four places of holding court.

Mr. THURMAN. I see no good reason why in this particular case (if Iowa is an exception it is the only one I know of besides Alabama) Alabama should be treated differently from the mode in which other States are treated. I do not think there is any precedent to be dreaded or any danger of running up the expenses of the judical administration of the United States by passing this bill as the Senators and Representatives from Alabama wish, and as the House has accorded to them.

Mr. STEVENSON. I have only a single remark to make. So far as I am concerned I shall always consult the wishes of Senators and the wishes of Representatives in the other House and the wishes of the judges, if it does not increase the expense; but if it does increase the expense, then I shall wait, and I think the committee will wait. Now I undertake to say that the expense is not increased so far as clerks and marshals go. That is the information I get.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator mean to say that there are three marshals in the State of Alabama?

Mr. STEVENSON. No, sir. I do not say that. I say that there are two, and there will be but two under this bill. There will not be one increase.

Mr. GOLDTHWAITE. One marshal for the northern and middle district.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How many grand juries will be summoned and petit juries?

Mr. STEVENSON. No more grand jurors or petit jurors so far as expense goes, because they will be at Montgomery if you have but one court, and how will the Senator satisfy himself when he talks about Federal jurisdiction, when he himself has divided the State of Louisiana into two judicial districts with two judges, with extra officers and extra clerks? That is what I consider increasing Federal jurisdiction when you increase Federal judges and increase Federal circuits. Then you increase expenses. That can be done in Louisiana.

The circuit judge who is to hold this court wrote this bill. That is the highest evidence to me in addition to the united voice both of the Senators and Representatives of the State, that the interests of the people demand it and require it; and if he is willing to do it why should any portion of the Judiciary Committee say "you shall not do it." They cannot say it upon the score of expense. There will not be another marshal and not another clerk. These men have had it from almost time immemorial.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Have had what?

Mr. STEVENSON. Have had courts at three distinct points, and that is all they ask now. Will the Judiciary Committee say that the circuit judge who proposes to hold three courts is not to be consulted? Is his opinion as to the necessity of this measure not to be looked to? Do we not know that whenever there is nothing that requires such a measure in the public interests, the judges affected always write to the Judiciary Committee and make suggestions? Judge Wood not only desires it, but framed this bill, and so far as I am concerned I want every State when the public expense is not increased to be accommodated in judicial matters as far as the desires of their people can be properly accorded.

Mr. WRIGHT. It has been said by the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Vermont, that it is desired by the committee that the Senate should determine this question fairly as to whether they propose to enter upon this scheme of increasing the courts. I need not tell the Senate that the committee have no kind of feeling on earth on this subject except simply to do what is just and right under the law.

It is suggested that the bar of Alabama have petitioned for these courts. There is not a State in this Union but what the bar at the different places would petition the Congress of the United States for an increase of courts, having no kind of regard to and no thought so far as the question of expense was concerned. It is said here that there is no necessary increase of expense. Does not every Senator know that you cannot have an increase of courts without an increase of expense? You have an increase of grand jurors and petit jurors. As you have an increase of the number of courts you have an increase in the days that the courts are held, you have an increase in the expense every day that you hold court in these different places as every person knows. You have a court at Huntsville, Alabama, a court at Montgomery, and a court at Mobile, and you necessarily have an increased expense.

I suppose Judge Wood, in suggesting that these courts be held at different places, acted on the admitted fact that Judge Busteed was not holding these courts. This is a mere temporary inconvenience, as every person understands. That temporary inconvenience can be remedied and would be remedied if another judge was appointed there; and it is suggested that impeachment articles have been preferred against the present incumbent. If a proper judge were appointed to hold the district courts, those courts could be held, and then the circuit court held in one place for the State of Alabama would be quite sufficient. The judicial business in the State of Alabama does not at all compare with that in other States that have but one circuit court. It does not compare with the business in my own State, where we have but one circuit court. It does not compare with other States where they have but one circuit court. They have their district courts or they may have them in three places. This bill provides, as I remember, that there shall be an increase of the clerks of the court. There necessarily follows an increase of days of holding court and all the expenses attending a court.

We have no kind of feeling on this subject except that a rule shall be established that shall be recognized as fair and just in reference to other States. The Senator from Kentucky refers to the case of Louisiana. Whether that be right or wrong under the circumstances does not at all affect this question. The circumstances attending that case were entirely different from what they are here. Louisiana had had two district courts before the rebellion, as we understand; a large State as compared with Alabama, and it was shown here and it was shown to the committee that so far as northern Louisiana was concerned jurors and witnesses had but one place to go to for holding the district court and but one place for the circuit court, and that was New Orleans, and they had to travel from four to five hundred miles and sometimes seven hundred miles to get to court at New Orleans, and the circumstances were so pressing and the recommendation such from the Department of Justice, that the committee felt justified in making that recommendation. In the State of Alabama they are in no different condition so far as the courts are concerned than are dozens of other States in the Union almost.

If the Senate under the circumstances determines that there shall be three places of holding the circuit court, while they have three district courts, and when the returns of the Department of Justice show that they have comparatively but little business in these different places, small as compared with other States of the Union, then you have started upon a scheme of putting these courts on wheels to travel into every county in the State, and the expense that will be entailed upon the Government and the consequence no one can tell.

The truth is, Mr. President, that these things are increasing every day, and it behooves the Senate to stop, else no person can tell where the expense will end. I want the State of Alabama to have all convenient places for holding court. I suggest to the Senators that the best way for them to determine this question is that they let the amendment reported by the committee prevail, let it go to the House; if they refuse to concur there can be a conference, and I believe that then, if it were accepted, they might agree upon a proposition to have a court at Montgomery and one at Mobile, and I am not sure but that might be a fair compromise; but as it stands now they insist on having three places of holding the circuit court, and therefore having a different condition of things than is found in any other State in this Union—but one district, and three places of holding court in that district. No other State can be found where there is a parallel to this so far as I now remember.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey to postpone the pending order and proceed to the consideration of the Utah bill.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will waive that motion for the present to have a vote on this matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question then is on the amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 12, nays 31; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Boutwell, Carpenter, Chandler, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Harvey, Oglesby, Ramsey, Scott, Wadleigh, and Wright—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Bayard, Bogy, Boreman, Clayton, Conover, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hitchcock, Kelly, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Norwood, Pease, Ransom, Sargent, Saulsbury, Spencer, Sprague, Stevenson, Stewart, Thurman, and Tipton—31.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Brownlow, Buckingham, Cameron, Conkling, Cragin, Dorsey, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Gilbert, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Howe, Ingalls, Johnston, Jones, Lewis, Logan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Patterson, Pratt, Robertson, Schurz, Sherman, Stockton, Washburn, West, and Windom—30.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now let the bill be read, that we may see what is in it.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think at this time of the night we might take a practical view of the question. It is clearly manifest that this bill will not pass until a very late hour of the morning, if at all, after the disposition that has been manifested.

Mr. THURMAN. It will pass in five minutes.

Mr. ANTHONY. It cannot pass in five minutes, because the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary has declared his intention to debate it. I certainly do not wish to prevent the passage of the bill if it is the desire of the Senate to pass it; but I think we are wasting our strength here which we require for the rest of the session. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. Is it in order to stop the Clerk in reading a bill, to make a motion to adjourn? Let the bill be read through. Let us hear it.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not think the Clerk has or claims any such privilege as that. It is done always.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CLAYTON in the chair.) A motion to adjourn is in order at all times. It is moved that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The Chief Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not intend to occupy the time of the Senate any more. I understand precisely the ground upon which this bill is to pass; but I wish to correct an error into which Senators who have been somewhat warm in their debate about this bill not creating any new offices, have fallen. Those Senators who listened to the reading of the bill, if there were any such, will see that it does set up the entire machinery of circuit courts in the northern and middle districts, there being all the machinery already in the southern district. It provides for the appointment of fresh clerks whose fees I suppose now by law may run up to $5,000 a year, and they have salaries also, which are not large to be sure. It then provides for the appointment I think of one more marshal, so that there is a marshal for each one of the three districts.

Mr. SPENCER. The Senator is mistaken in that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It may be; perhaps I was mistaken before when I understood all the Senators to say it did not create any new officers at all. The Senator from Kentucky harped on the subject that there was no additional expense; that it did not provide for any; if it did then it would be another thing. Now, you find when you come to read the bill that it goes the full figure; nothing is left undone to set it up. I merely wish to say now as to this bill that I leave it for one in charge of the Senators who wish to pass it with all the provisions it contains without taking any personal responsibility about it myself.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SARGENT. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at three o'clock and thirty minutes a. m. on Sunday, June 21,) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, June 20, 1874.

The House met at eleven o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read in part, when the reading was suspended to receive a

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed a resolution for the suspension of the sixteenth and seventeenth joint rules of the two Houses for the residue of the present session; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

SUSPENSION OF JOINT RULES 16 AND 17.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the House concur in the resolution just received from the Senate for the suspension of the sixteenth and seventeenth joint rules of the two Houses for the remainder of the present session. I may say that I do not know that there is any other reason for the existence of those rules than that they may be suspended.

The SPEAKER. That is all the use the Chair has ever known for them.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would suggest to the gentleman that there might be a time when the rules might become important. They were put there like a sword in a sheath to be used in an emergency.

Mr. GARFIELD. They were designed to be a brake on the business; but there is no need of a brake now.

The SPEAKER. The sixteenth and seventeenth joint rules of the two Houses will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

16. No bill that shall have passed one House shall be sent for concurrence to the other on either of the three last days of the session.

17. No bill or resolution that shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate shall be presented to the President of the United States, for his approbation, on the last day of the session.

The SPEAKER. The Chair believes that there never has been a session since the rules were adopted that they have not been declared inoperative.

Mr. NIBLACK. I have no objection to concurring in the resolution of the Senate; but I would ask, why should those rules be maintained if they are always to be suspended?

Mr. GARFIELD. There is a case in which these rules might be made operative. Suppose we were in this situation, that the Senate wanted to force the House to a final adjournment without passing certain bills, or that the House wanted to force an adjournment without the passage of certain bills. This is a complete check which one House has upon the business of the other if it chooses to exercise it. In some instances it might be of great value.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. If I may be permitted to say a word, I believe these rules were intended to save the country from the passage of those ill-considered and ill-understood bills which get through during the hurry and confusion of the last three days of a session of Congress. They are most wise and salutary rules, although undoubtedly there may be a necessity to suspend them for certain bills essential to the public business. But if instead of consenting to suspend them generally every year as we do, the suspension was limited to appropriation bills and bills of like character, I think it would be one of the greatest safeguards the country would have against ill-considered legislation.

Mr. KELLOGG. I would suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts that if the rules were enforced as he suggests it would cut off every pension bill that passes in the latter portion of the session.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Well, then, the pension bills ought to be passed earlier in the session.

Mr. MAYNARD. These are rules which everybody who has studied the matter for a moment will see look to the greater independence of the two Houses of Congress. I may say that owing to the universal comity between the two Houses they have never yet been enforced. They have been suspended, I think, every year by general consent. The rules, however, are right enough, and their suspension is also right enough.

Mr. NIBLACK. I think these rules are right and that they should be enforced; but I do not propose to put myself in the position of objecting to this motion.

Mr. SENER. If this discussion is proceeding by unanimous consent, I object to it.

The SPEAKER. It is not proceeding by unanimous consent; the motion is debatable.

Mr. RANDALL. The fact is that these rules ought to be retained, but an exception should be made in favor of appropriation bills. They should be the only bills allowed to pass between the two Houses on the last three days of the session. The enforcement of this rule would prevent action by the two Houses on bills which are crowded through in the closing hours of the session and which should not pass at all.

The SPEAKER. As this question is before the House, the Chair will make the remark that it is the appropriation bills above all other bills to which the rule should apply.

Mr. RANDALL. They are always delayed until the last days of the session.

The SPEAKER. That is the very evil that these rules were originally designed to correct.

Mr. RANDALL. But they have failed in their purpose.

The SPEAKER. Entirely so; and the Chair believes that every year since 1822 these rules have been suspended at the end of the session, and the proposition to suspend them has uniformly come from the Senate as it does now. It takes a majority vote only to suspend these rules.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now call for a vote on my motion to concur with the Senate in suspending these rules.

The question was taken; and the resolution of the Senate was concurred in.

READING OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I now call for the continuation of the reading of the Journal; I believe it was not completed.

The SPEAKER. It was not.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the Journal.

Mr. DAWES. I move that the rules be suspended so as to dispense with the further reading of the Journal.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the further reading of the Journal was dispensed with.

MANAGERS OF NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED SOLDIERS.

Mr. ALBRIGHT, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 114) to fill a vacancy in the board of managers of the National Home for Disabled Soldiers; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution appoints JAMES S. NEGLEY, of Pennsylvania, a manager of the National Home for Disabled Soldiers in the place of Jay Cooke, of Pennsylvania, resigned.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

OWNERS OF SCHOONER ADA A. ANDREWS.

On motion of Mr. EAMES, by unanimous consent, the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. No. 688) referring the claim of the owners of the schooner Ada A. Andrews to the Court of Claims, and the same was brought before the House for consideration.

The bill provides that the claim of the legal owner or owners of the schooner Ada A. Andrews, her cargo, freight, and personal effects, alleged to have been sunk by collision with the United States vessel of war Ticonderoga on or about the 1st day of May, 1871, be referred to the Court of Claims to hear and determine the same to judgment, with right of appeal as in other cases. No suit is to be brought under the provisions of the act after six months from the date of the passage thereof.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is this a report from a committee?

Mr. EAMES. The passage of the bill is recommended by the Committee on Claims of the House.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

CHANGE OF NAMES OF VESSELS.

Mr. CONGER, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1767) to change the name of the steamboat Kitty Strong.

The bill authorizes the owners of the steamboat Kitty Strong to change the name of said boat to Fanny Ellis, and provides that from and after the passage of the act it shall be entitled to a register by that name.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CONGER also, by unanimous consent, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No 3211) to change the name of the schooner Delmar.

The bill authorizes the owners of the schooner Delmar to change its name to Addie Henry, and provides that a register be granted in the new name.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

KENTUCKY AGRICULTURAL AND MECHANICAL ASSOCIATION.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask consent to report from the Committee on War Claims, for action at this time, Senate bill No. 375, for the benefit of the Kentucky Agricultural and Mechanical Association.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read; after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill appropriates $25,000 to the Kentucky Agricultural and Mechanical Association to pay for damages to their fair grounds resulting from their occupancy by United States troops during the late rebellion, said sum having been recommended to be paid by the board of claims and by the Secretary of War.

Mr. HOLMAN. I give notice that after this bill shall have been disposed of I will insist upon the regular order.

The bill was received, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DAWES. I rise to a privileged report.

Mr. POLAND. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has given notice that he will insist upon the regular order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not desire so much to go to business on the Speaker's table as to prevent this indiscriminate legislation that is going on here.

CONDITION OF ARKANSAS.

Mr. POLAND. On yesterday I reported as I supposed all the testimony taken by the committee in relation to affairs in Arkansas. It turns out, however, that I reported only about one-half of it. I desire now to report the rest of it, and also to ask a vote upon the resolution which I reported yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The Chair had forgotten for the moment that the resolution to which the gentleman refers was taken out of its regular place by a privileged report. That resolution really is now pending.

The resolution was as follows:

Resolved, That the select committee of the House appointed under a resolution adopted May 27, 1874, to inquire into the disturbed condition of governmental affairs in the State of Arkansas be continued during the recess of Congress, with the same powers conferred by the resolution under which said committee was appointed.

Mr. POLAND. I desire to say simply this: the committee have already taken the testimony of a considerable number of persons from Arkansas——

Mr. ELDREDGE. I object to any debate on this resolution; it is something like the South Carolina case, and I do not want my friend to get into any embarrassed condition.

Mr. POLAND. I have no purpose to.

Mr. ELDREDGE. It takes a great deal more money out of the Treasury than the South Carolina case did. I object to debate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no objection to the report being made, but I believe the resolution is not a part of the report.

The SPEAKER. It is; it was reported on yesterday.

Mr. POLAND. The committee have examined a considerable number of witnesses from Arkansas, and have got a general idea of the condition of things in that State. The committee were unanimously of the opinion, the democratic as well as the republican members of it, that it was necessary for the peace and good order of the State of Arkansas that this investigation should be continued during the vacation. So far as I and the other members of the committee are concerned, we have no special desire to go to Arkansas; but we are of the opinion that it is highly important that the committee should be continued during the vacation. I therefore ask a vote.

Mr. COX. I think——

Mr. POLAND. I call for the previous question.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Is this a privileged resolution?

The SPEAKER. It is; and was reported on yesterday and entertained without objection.

The previous question was seconded; upon a division there were ayes 80, noes not counted; and the main question was ordered.

The question was upon adopting the resolution.

Mr. ELDREDGE. We may as well have the yeas and nays on that question.

The yeas and nays were ordered, there being 27 in the affirmative, (more than one-fifth of the last vote.)

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 139, nays 74, not voting 76; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Barrere, Biery, Bradley, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Cannon, Cessna, Freeman Clarke, Clements, Stephen A. So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. POLAND moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAY OF HOUSE EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. HOSKINS. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund, committee clerks, folders, pages, and other employés of the House for the full month of June, 1874.

Mr. RANDALL. I raise the point of order that the action here proposed requires a law to accomplish it.

FOLKES & WINSTON.

Mr. WHITEHEAD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3763) for the relief of Folkes & Winston and others, citizens of Lynchburgh, Virginia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

CAPTAIN HUGH HUGHES.

Mr. MACDOUGALL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3764) granting a pension to Captain Hugh Hughes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

MRS. SUSAN M'ELWAIN.

WILLIAM H. JOHNSTON.

Mr. RUSK, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back adversely the petition of William H. Johnston, praying for a pension; which was laid on the table, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CURRENCY.

Mr. DAWES submitted the following report:

The second committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 1572) to amend the several acts providing a national currency and to establish free banking, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same, with an amendment, as follows: Strike out all of the amendment after "that," in the first line, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

The act entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved June 3, 1864, shall be hereafter known as "the national-bank act."

SEC. 2. That section 31 of "the national-bank act" be so amended that the several associations therein provided for shall not hereafter be required to keep on hand any amount of money whatever by reason of the amount of their respective circulations; but the moneys required by said section to be kept at all times on hand shall be determined by the amount of deposits in all respects, as provided for in the said section.

SEC. 3. That every association organized, or to be organized, under the provisions of the said act, and of the several acts amendatory thereof, shall at all times keep and have on deposit in the Treasury of the United States, in lawful money of the United States, a sum equal to 5 per cent. of its circulation, to be held and used for the redemption of such circulation; which sum shall be counted as a part of its lawful reserve, as provided in section 2 of this act; and when the circulating notes of any such associations, assorted or unassorted, shall be presented for redemption in sums of $1,000 or any multiple thereof to the Treasurer of the United States, the same shall be redeemed in United States notes. All notes so redeemed shall be charged by the Treasurer of the United States to the respective associations issuing the same, and he shall notify them severally on the first day of each month, or oftener, at his discretion, of the amount of such redemptions; and whenever such redemptions for any association shall amount to the sum of $500, such association so notified shall forthwith deposit with the Treasurer of the United States a sum in United States notes equal to the amount of its circulating notes so redeemed. And all notes of national banks, worn, defaced, mutilated, or otherwise unfit for circulation shall, when received by any assistant treasurer or at any designated depository of the United States, be forwarded to the Treasurer of the United States for redemption as provided herein. And when such redemptions have been so reimbursed, the circulating notes so redeemed shall be forwarded to the respective associations by which they were issued; but if any such notes are worn, mutilated, defaced, or rendered otherwise unfit for use, they shall be forwarded to the Comptroller of the Currency and destroyed, and replaced as now provided by law: Provided, That each of said associations shall reimburse to the Treasury the charges for transportation and the costs for assorting such notes; and the associations hereafter organized shall also severally reimburse to the Treasury the cost of engraving such plates as shall be ordered by each association respectively; and the amount assessed upon each association shall be in proportion to the circulation redeemed, and be charged to the fund on deposit with the Treasurer: And provided further, That so much of section 32 of said national-bank act requiring or permitting the redemption of its circulating notes elsewhere than at its own counter, except as provided for in this section, is hereby repealed.

SEC. 4. That any association organized under this act, or any of the acts of which this is an amendment, desiring to withdraw its circulating notes, in whole or in part, may, upon the deposit of lawful money with the Treasurer of the United States in sums of not less than $9,000, take up the bonds which said association has on deposit with the Treasurer for the security of such circulating notes, which bonds shall be assigned to the bank in the manner specified in the nineteenth section of the national-bank act; and the outstanding notes of said association, to an amount equal to the legal-tender notes deposited, shall be redeemed at the Treasury of the United States, and destroyed as now provided by law: Provided, That the amount of the bonds on deposit for circulation shall not be reduced below $50,000.

SEC. 5. That the Comptroller of the Currency shall, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, cause the charter numbers of the association to be printed upon all national-bank notes which may be hereafter issued by him.

SEC. 6. That the amount of United States notes outstanding and to be used as a part of the circulating medium shall not exceed the sum of $382,000,000, which said sum shall appear in each monthly statement of the public debt, and no part thereof shall be held or used as a reserve.

SEC. 7. That so much of the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," as provides that no circulation shall be withdrawn, under the provisions of section 6 of said act, until after the fifty-four millions granted in section 1 of said act shall have been taken up, is hereby repealed; and it shall be the duty of the Comptroller of the Currency, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, to proceed forthwith, and he is hereby authorized and required, from time to time, as applications shall be duly made therefor, and until the full amount of $55,000,000 shall be withdrawn, to make requisitions upon each of the national banks described in said section, and in the manner therein provided, organized in States having an excess of circulation, to withdraw and return so much of their circulation as by said act may be apportioned to be withdrawn from them, or, in lieu thereof, to deposit in the Treasury of the United States lawful money sufficient to redeem such circulation, and upon the return of the circulation required, or the deposit of lawful money, as herein provided, a proportionate amount of the bonds held to secure the circulation of such association as shall make such return or deposit shall be surrendered to it.

SEC. 8. That upon the failure of the national banks upon which requisition for circulation shall be made, or of any of them, to return the amount required, or to deposit in the Treasury lawful money to redeem the circulation required, within thirty days, the Comptroller of the Currency shall at once sell, as provided in section 49 of the national-currency act, approved June 3, 1864, bonds held to secure the redemption of the circulation of the association or associations which shall so fail, to an amount sufficient to redeem the circulation required of such association or associations, and with the proceeds, which shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States, so much of the circulation of such association or associations shall be redeemed as will equal the amount required and not returned; and if there be an excess of proceeds over the amount required for such redemption, it shall be returned to the association or associations whose bonds shall have been sold. And it shall be the duty of the Treasurer, assistant treasurers, designated depositaries, and national-bank depositaries of the United States, who shall be kept informed by the Comptroller of the Currency of such associations as shall fail to return circulation as required, to assort and return to the Treasury for redemption the notes of such associations as shall come into their hands until the amount required shall be redeemed, and in like manner to assort and return to the Treasury, for redemption, the notes of such national banks as have failed, or gone into voluntary liquidation for the purpose of winding up their affairs, and of such as shall hereafter so fail or go into liquidation.

SEC. 9. That from and after the passage of this act it shall be lawful for the Comptroller of the Currency, and he is hereby required, to issue circulating notes, without delay, as applications therefor are made, not to exceed the sum of $55,000,000, to associations organized, or to be organized, in those States and Territories having less than their proportion of circulation, under an apportionment made on the basis of population and of wealth, as shown by the returns of the census of 1870; and every association hereafter organized shall be subject to, and be governed by the rules, restrictions, and limitations, and possess the rights, privileges, and franchises, now or hereafter to be prescribed by law as to national banking associations, with the same power to amend, alter, and repeal provided by "the national-bank act:" Provided, That the whole amount of circulation withdrawn and redeemed from banks transacting business shall not exceed $55,000,000, and that such circulation shall be withdrawn and redeemed as it shall be necessary to supply the circulation previously issued to the banks in those States having less than their apportionment: And provided further, That not more than $30,000,000 shall be withdrawn and redeemed as contemplated during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875.

And that the title be amended so as to read as follows:

An act fixing the amount of the United States notes, providing for a redistribution of the national-bank currency, and for other purposes.

H. L. DAWES,
GEO. W. McCRARY,
S. S. MARSHALL,
Managers on the part of the House.
GEO. G. WRIGHT,
T. W. FERRY,
J. W. STEVENSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. KASSON. It occurs to me that in the first proviso of the ninth section the words "circulation previously issued to the banks" should have been read "circulation provided to be issued to the banks."

Mr. DAWES. "Previously issued" is correct.

Mr. KASSON. Then I ask some explanation of that provision, because I do not understand it.

Mr. NIBLACK. I trust the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] will explain briefly the effect of the amendment proposed by the committee of conference.

Mr. DAWES. I do not know how far the House will care to have its time consumed in explanation or discussion upon this matter which has been so much before it during the session. But this is an important bill; and certainly, at least to the extent of enabling the House to understand the difference between this report and others that have preceded it, it is important that it should be explained.

The committee of conference, in addition to that character which pertains to every committee of conference, was a second committee. The matter submitted to it was a bill which had been discussed for a long time in both branches of Congress; had undergone serious amendment as it passed from this branch to the other; had come back to us and after discussion had been referred to a committee of conference representing according to the rules of both branches their respective majorities, and yet commissioned to make such concessions of the views embodied in the two bills of those majorities as the committee felt it within their power to make in a common bill. The report agreed upon, coming here from the other branch, had been submitted here and had failed. Under those circumstances the second committee of conference was appointed, representing, as the Speaker was bound to make it represent, the indicated majority in this House, to meet another committee representing a similar majority in the other branch, to see whether any further concessions or any departure, consistent with the rules, from the position taken by either branch was possible to bring the two branches together. The result is embodied in the report that has been read at the Clerk's desk. This report, I regret to say, does not contain, as did the first committee's report, any provision either for an early resumption of specie payments on the part of the Government or for any retirement under any circumstances of any portion of its issues. Speaking for myself, I say that so far as I am concerned I regret exceedingly that it has been found impossible to bring the two Houses to any such agreement upon an early resumption of specie payments, a corresponding retirement of the United States notes, and a substitution of national-bank currency in their place.

But, sir, a matter which seemed to some of us not only demanded by the public faith and the obligations of the Government, but also which seemed to some of us at least as easy of accomplishment, it has been found by the two Houses themselves as well as by two conference committees to be utterly impossible to bring the two Houses together upon. Therefore, in the forefront of the consideration of this conference committee was the question whether it were impossible to bring them together upon any such question—upon that question which seemed to some of us to be the most vital of all of them, while to others it seemed as impracticable altogether. The question then arose whether the conference committee should be abandoned at that point, or whether it were worth while for a committee to see whether upon some other ground there might be a mutual agreement and concurrence of action in the two branches. And the two main features of the report submitted to the House are the results of that conference. The other features of it are matters which have been passed upon by both branches, and about which up to yesterday no gentleman in either branch, so far as I have observed, has raised any discussion whatever. Therefore, I do not dwell very much on them.

The committee, Mr. Speaker, has addressed itself to the question of fixing the maximum of the United States notes. It is unnecessary for me to call the attention of the House to the difficulties which have existed for a year or more past in reference to the uncertainty which there has been in that regard in the administration of the Treasury Department, and to the evils which have resulted because of that uncertainty in the business community as well as in the operation of our public affairs. One portion of the people and a large portion of the Legislature held it already had been fixed at $356,000,000. The Treasury Department and the other Departments of the Government held the sum of $356,000,000 was the minimun amount, and that the maximum sum was $400,000,000. The $44,000,000 between these two sums was to remain a floating amount of currency to be held in the hands of one man in Washington, and to be by him put into the column of circulation at his own pleasure or to be by him withdrawn at his pleasure at any time and under any circumstances which seemed to justify him, whatever might be the distress to the business of the country, or whatever might be the other consequences attending either upon putting it out or taking it in.

This has been the condition of public affairs for the last year or more. This was the condition of public affairs during the late panic which witnessed the spectacle of men already drunk with speculation and staggering about Wall street with the load of their liabilities turning to the Treasury Department of the United States and imploring it to float them over the breakers into some fairer sea by an indefinite issue of a new volume of the currency of the United States. Unless this committee of conference could agree upon something that would put an end to that condition of affairs, it would continue perhaps after the adjournment of Congress indefinitely. Forty-four million dollars of currency were held in the hands, at the will, and at the caprice of one man. It was too great a power to intrust to the hands of one man, however great might be the confidence of the people in the integrity and wisdom of that officer. His whisper would touch the pulse of Wall street as if an electric wire connected his lips with the stock brokers on 'change. With every Bureau of the Treasury Department there was some mysterious communication almost of the unspoken thoughts of the Secretary of the Treasury, some interpretation of his daily walk, if not of his daily utterances, to the exchange of Wall street. There was undue inflation or collapse. Gigantic fortunes were built up or blown down daily in Wall street, affecting throughout the whole country every branch of industry and every enterprise and investment. The committee therefore could not but see they were doing something if they could but put an end to that condition of things. They have in this report agreed to fix a maximum of United States notes at $382,000,000, which happens to be the sum out, and to fix it in such way that it shall not express an opinion to Congress as to the legality of the issue above $356,000,000. At the same time we give to the circulation whatever there may be above $356,000,000 which shall be now out, whether legally out or not. We fix the maximum and give it such character while it is out that it shall not be in the power of any one man hereafter to affect the volume of the currency by putting out or withdrawing any portion of what may be called the reserve. We have fixed the maximum in this report at $382,000,000, and provided what there is out above $356,000,000 shall be a part of the circulating medium and shall appear monthly in the statement of the public debt. We have provided that it shall not be considered in the technical language of the Treasury Department as any portion of the Treasury reserve, which means, in the language of that Department, a volume of currency which can be put out or drawn in at the pleasure of the head of the Department.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman allow me to address a question to him at this point of his statement?

Mr. DAWES. I would a little rather go through with it without interruption.

That is the first of the two main features of this conference report. The second is of a different character. The repeated discussions and votes in this House and the other branch have determined several things, so far as this Congress is concerned, past all question. One is, after able and exhaustive debate, in the struggle between conflicting opinions, that there shall be no increase of the volume of United States notes—there shall be no addition to them. Equally clear has it been made to appear by the discussions and votes of both branches that they are equally decided that there shall be no further increase of the national-bank currency. Therefore the country knows, so far as this Congress is concerned, that the whole volume of this currency, national and bank-note, is capable of being ascertained in figures, and is a fixed sum for the present. They have also decided by the results of the vote upon the last conference report, if nothing else, that in the present condition of affairs at least free banking is an impossibility. However much many of us or most of us might desire free banking, however I would myself desire it, as I have advocated it here upon this floor, no gentleman, so far as I have heard, has been willing to advocate free banking without certain safeguards thrown around it that shall give it safety and character and worth. Of course there has been a difference of opinion as to what amount of safeguard is absolutely necessary. But no gentleman that I have heard of has advocated the unlimited right of banking in the present condition of affairs without either a redemption of United States notes by the Treasury or a redemption of the bank-notes.

But the House has voted down a conference report that coupled with early resumption the principle of free banking. Therefore the committee found themselves in this position, that the amount of United States notes fixed the amount of national currency. And they found also staring them in the face two other questions. One large section of this country, according to the universal testimony from all quarters of it, is in need of and demands more currency. The other portion of the country has more than its just and equitable share of this bank currency.

The question, then, for us to consider is this: You deny to the country any more national circulation; you deny them free banking. Shall that portion of the country that has got more than its share hold on to that also, and say that the other portion shall not have an equitable distribution of it?

Sir, it was my misfortune in that committee of conference to be the only representative in it of that portion of the country that has more than its share of the bank-note circulation of the country, while all the other members of that committee of conference represented that portion that had not its share, and was demanding, for what seemed to them the necessities of their portion of the country, more of that currency. I did not deem it to be exactly fair on my part, if I had the power in a committee of six—I did not think that it should come from me, representing those who had more than their share—to say to those who had less than their share, I will neither give you more nor will I let you have that portion which belongs to you and which the section of the country which I represent has.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Will the gentleman allow a question there, or does he propose to allow any debate after he has made his statement?

Mr. DAWES. I will, pretty soon.

I am giving the House the views which led the committee to a unanimous report. I thought, sir, that least of all should opposition to an equitable distribution of this currency come from those who had more than their share. If there was any propriety and just reason against an equitable distribution, it would be more becoming that it should come from other sources than from those who had more than their share. I do not forget, also, that constantly in the debate on this question those representing that section which has more than its share openly proclaimed in both branches of Congress their entire willingness to yield up everything they had of bank-note currency in excess of their share. I had myself so stated. I had heard it from my colleagues and from those representing that section of the country in both branches. I had seen it tendered as an amendment to the pending bill in the other branch from that very section of the country. And under these circumstances I gave in my adhesion to the report which proposed to redistribute $55,000,000 of about $80,000,000 which is now retained by a single section of the country more than it is entitled to according to the ratio of wealth and population.

There is one other feature of the bill to which I wish to call attention for a moment. It is that feature of it which releases the reserve on circulation. This provision was in the original bill reported to this House by the Committee on Banking and Currency and was in the last conference report.

Mr. MAYNARD. And in the Senate amendment also.

Mr. DAWES. Yes; and in the Senate amendment also. It had therefore received the sanction of both branches of Congress by very large majorities. It had excited no discussion in the other branch, either in the discussion of the merits of the two bills or in the discussion of the first conference report.

The theory of the banking law more clearly understood shows to the country that there is no occasion or reason on the principles of the banking law for retaining any reserve for the protection of circulation. This agreement has released and put into the volume of the currency a portion of the United States notes now held as a part of the reserve; just how much it is it is a little difficult to determine. It was stated in the debate in the other branch of Congress, when the former conference report upon this subject was before that branch and was disputed nowhere, that it released about $26,500,000 of United States notes. It releases 2 per cent. on the amount of the United States notes, equal to 2 per cent. on the circulation of all the banks except certain banks in the cities that are required to retain 25 per cent. of their circulation and deposits, and it releases 12½ per cent. of those as nearly as can be calculated. It will release about $26,500,000 of greenbacks that are locked up in the vaults of the national banks practically. It is not always so. I am informed by experienced bankers that practically it is hardly ever so; so that to the extent that that is not so this will make no practical change in the volume of the circulating medium of the country. But while it thus releases about $26,500,000, on the other hand this bill takes out of the power of one man $18,000,000 of United States notes that he cannot only put into the currency when he pleases but can take it out when he pleases, and no man can know whether he has done it or not until he puts his hand upon the pulse of business in Wall street, New York, and in other cities of this country. If this bill passes it will release $18,000,000 of United States notes now held in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury, claiming and hitherto exercising the power at the most critical moments, inopportune it may be, depending wholly upon his sagacity, and not only upon his sagacity, but upon the impossibility of improper approach to him or to any one under him, and therefore as between the $26,000,000 thus practically put into the circulation of the country and $18,000,000 fixed forever beyond reach, it practically reduces this to only $8,000,000.

But, further, unless this bill passes there are $26,000,000 more besides these $18,000,000—$44,000,000 in all—that can be made a football, that can be made the plaything of speculators, and can work all the evil consequences that it is in the power of men, by inflating the currency, to work upon the business community. Therefore, sir, whatever objection there may be upon the point that releasing this amount of currency to that extent inflates the volume of the currency, it is to my mind vastly counterbalanced by the $18,000,000 forever withdrawn and the $26,000,000 which is practically a part of the currency, being so fixed that it can no longer be withdrawn.

Therefore, sir, I commend this report to the consideration of the House. I commend it particularly to that section of the country that has steadily refused two things—an increase of the volume of the currency and free banking, and which has at the same time got $80,000,000 more than its share of the currency. I say to that section of the country, "You cannot afford to stand before the people in the attitude of hesitating whether you will do justice in the distribution of what currency there is if you refuse to make any more." I desire to suggest to them that they are ultimately in the power of the other section of the country which now only demands this equitable distribution and nothing more. I suggest to them that to do equity is the surest way to secure equity.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts to one or two points. I ask him to examine the sixth section of the bill reported. The last clause of that section reads that "no part thereof"—that is, the $38,000,000 legal-tender notes—"shall be held or used as a reserve." This word "reserve" occurs twice in this bill, once in the third section where it has reference to the reserve held by the banks. It is used in that sense invariably in the national-bank act, and in all the amendments to that act. This usage of it here is intended, I infer, to mean a very different thing; not the reserve to be held in banks but the reserve to be held in the Treasury. Now the word "reserve" as connected with the $44,000,000 is not on the statute-book; but the committee use it here. We cannot amend this bill; if we could one or two words would make the matter clear; but I hope the gentleman will take the trouble to put upon the record, in the course of this debate, the sense in which the committee have used the word "reserve" here.

Mr. GARFIELD. Before the question is answered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] I would ask if the word "reserve" would exclude the conclusion that the Secretary of the Treasury may not hold the ordinary currency balance in the Treasury? For instance, every month when the books are made up and a statement of the condition of the Treasury is prepared, there is reported so much gold in the Treasury and so much currency. In a proper sense of the term that is a reserve. I know that is not what the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] means, but it is a proper meaning of the word. It is a reserve fund which we hold on hand in the Treasury.

Mr. DAWES. I agree with both the gentlemen. The proper meaning of the word "reserve" is just what the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] says it is. And that is a proper use of the word "reserve" which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] makes of it. But the Treasury Department has a term which it applies to the legal-tender notes over and above $356,000,000; it appears in their official report, and they apply it to that very sum. There is a law which fixes the sum of $356,000,000 as the limit of the legal-tender currency. To all above that amount the Treasury Department applies the term "reserve." We have thought it best to take away that quality and that only from the amount above $356,000,000, to which the Treasury Department has seen fit to apply the term "reserve." They claim that that amount they can hold and not be required to account for it as a part of the public debt, but whenever in their opinion the exigency of the Treasury or of the public requires it they can put it into circulation or take it back. It is that meaning of the word "reserve" attached by the Treasury Department and applied by the Treasury Department to the $44,000,000 that the committee of conference have sought to take away.

Mr. MAYNARD. It has no reference to the reserve held by the banks?

Mr. DAWES. Not at all.

Mr. NIBLACK. I have been unable to hear distinctly all that the gentleman from Massachusetts has said. But if I understood him correctly, the proposed amendment to the national banking law included in this conference report does not increase the aggregate of the bank circulation, but simply redistributes it.

Mr. DAWES. That is all.

Mr. NIBLACK. I am very glad to hear it. While I have been unwilling to vote to increase the aggregate amount of national-bank circulation, I am very glad to have the opportunity to redistribute the present volume of the currency.

Mr. BURCHARD. I desire to ask the gentleman if, under the sixth section of the bill reported by the committee of conference, the Secretary of the Treasury would have the power to retire or cancel any portion of the $382,000,000 of legal-tenders, to reduce what is called the reserve down to the limit of $356,000,000?

Mr. DAWES. If he does so, I do not see how it can be continued as a part of the circulation.

Mr. BURCHARD. The language is "the amount outstanding and to be used shall not exceed $382,000,000."

Mr. MERRIAM. Is it the intention of the committee of conference that the amount shall not be decreased without further authority of law?

Mr. DAWES. It is the intention of the committee to use language that shall make the portion of what has been called the reserve and which is now outstanding just exactly as much a part of the circulation as is the $356,000,000. But we have used this language because a portion of the committee believed that the only legal limit was $356,000,000, but they were willing to say that it should not exceed $382,000,000 because the $382,000,000 was already out, and even if it was in our power it was too late to reduce the amount to $356,000,000.

Mr. MERRIAM. One other question, and that is, can any portion of the $382,000,000 be used in the current expenses of the Treasury?

Mr. DAWES. I think if the Secretary of the Treasury has it there can be no objection to his using it.

Mr. MARSHALL. I desire to say something upon this report, but I prefer to have the floor in my own right.

Mr. DAWES. In that case, then, I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY.]

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I had not thought at all of speaking upon this report, and had intended to give only a silent vote against it. But the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] have led me to believe that it would be wise, or whether wise or not, at least it would be satisfactory, to say a word or two. There was running all through his remarks, if not the charge, at least the intimation that there is or there might be some selfish purpose on the part of New Englanders to hold on to their present volume of the bank circulation and refuse to yield any portion of it. He gave as an apology for voting for this bill the reason that as a New Englander he could not take the ground that the currency should not be redistributed.

Mr. DAWES. Not as an apology.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Not as an apology; then we may take it for granted that he is proud of his bill. Let him go with that to Massachusetts. Now I wish to say as a New Englander, and one representing a banking center, that I am willing to vote for the $55,000,000 redistribution clause. And if the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] had not offered his $25,000,000 redistribution bill as he did, and if I had not relied upon him Monday after Monday to press his bill to a vote, I should myself have brought it forward and asked the action of the House upon it.

Mr. HUBBELL. I desire to say——

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Not a word; I do not yield; let me alone. I take the floor without interruption; I have only five minutes anyhow. I say as a New Englander, coming from a section where there is a large number of banks, that you are perfectly at liberty this moment to take away from us all the national-bank currency that may be necessary to equalize the circulation; if the amount be twenty-five millions, say so; if $40,000,000, say so; if $55,000,000, say so. But I will not vote for any measure which increases the volume of irredeemable paper currency, or while leaving it nominally as it now is, increases the volume of currency in actual use and therefore expands prices and broadens the margin between paper and gold, and to that extent postpones, and perhaps indefinitely postpones, the day of resumption. I will vote for any measure necessary to equalize the circulation.

The gentleman says (and this brings me to my second point) that the reserve for circulation is not needed, and therefore this bill releases the banks from all responsibility, from all requirement to keep any reserve for circulation. If then that reserve be unnecessary this is a very admirable opportunity to take back so much of an irredeemable paper currency, to take it out of the world, to burn it up. This is the opportunity the gentleman should have seen in this—not an opportunity to release $70,000,000 of paper to enter into business and inflate prices. If that reserve be not needed in the banks as a reserve against the circulation, retire it, fund it, get rid of it, that we may approach the day of resumption.

One more point. As to the $26,000,000 of the Treasury reserve, I hold, with a great many very able lawyers whom I humbly follow, that that $26,000,000 was issued without any authority of law or Constitution. I believe that the limit of the legal-tenders was three hundred and fifty-six millions, and that the issue of one dollar after we got down to that limit was unconstitutional. The President and the Secretary of the Treasury only used this amount as a reserve, holding it to be their duty, when the emergency had passed, to return again to the legal limit of $356,000,000. I think I state correctly the position of the Administration. I would then return as soon as possible to that limit, and not allow this twenty-six millions to be out. It has been wrongly out, and neither the President nor the Secretary of the Treasury has asked that it should be kept out permanently. But now it is proposed to take advantage of a transient emergency to continue permanently as a part of the legal-tender circulation that twenty-six millions, which course I believe to be not only in violation of sound financial principles but of the Constitution.

I cannot vote for this bill. I am anxious to attain a satisfactory, reasonable settlement on this question. I am willing you should take from the New England banks every dollar that may be necessary to equalize the distribution of the currency. But I will not vote for any measure that expands the volume of the irredeemable paper currency. Gentlemen of all parties, you have got to come to this doctrine, just as sure as grass grows and water runs.

Mr. KELLEY. No, sir; the gentleman has got to abandon his doctrine.

Mr. DAWES. I now yield to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE.]

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I am, like the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] willing to vote for a redistribution of the banking currency of the country, knowing as he does that a portion of it will be taken from that part of the country where we both reside. But I go farther than he does. I am not only willing to vote for it as an abstract proposition of fairness, but I am going to vote for this bill. The difference between him and me is that he is in favor of a redistribution of the currency when the question is not up and cannot be voted for, while I in a spirit of fairness——

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. That is an unjust and ungentlemanly insinuation. [The Speaker rapped to order.]

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I have been here too long to be——

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I insist, sir, that the remark just made by the gentleman is a dishonorable insinuation.

Mr. MAYNARD. I call the gentleman from Connecticut to order, and ask that his words be taken down.

The SPEAKER. The words were entirely unparliamentary.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Whose words?

The SPEAKER. The language of the gentleman from Connecticut was altogether unparliamentary.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. So far as my words may have been of an unparliamentary character, I cheerfully withdraw them.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I have been here too long to be scolded down by the gentleman from Connecticut.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut was entirely out of order.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I was saying, and I repeat for the benefit of the gentleman from Connecticut, that he is in favor of a redistribution of the currency when the question is not up, but he has just declared that he will not vote for it when it is up, while I am in favor of it and will vote for it when an opportunity occurs. I will do it, as I believe, in a spirit of fairness and concession to other sections of the country. Though I do not believe in the doctrines which are generally supposed to prevail in that section upon questions affecting the currency, yet I concede the honesty of such views with the men who entertain them, and I am willing to concede redistribution.

Mr. SHANKS. In other words, on this proposition the gentleman admits of our being honest but not very sensible.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I am speaking of the general sentiment tending to inflation, in which I do not join. Now, sir, I am all the more willing to vote for this bill because as an eastern man I believe that the danger of inflation pure and simple has passed away. The action of this Congress, in this House, in the Senate, and in the conference committees, together with the action of the Executive, makes it plain that the danger of the exercise of what I believe to be a pernicious power on the part of Congress, that of swelling the volume of the greenback currency in time of peace, is I hope a thing of the past. I do not believe it will come up again dangerously. I give more weight to the result of the battle fought here this winter. In holding the position of opposition to inflation here and elsewhere the gentlemen who have represented me in sentiment (I have not myself talked much on the matter) admitted that at present the banking currency is not distributed according to the wealth, business, and population of the country, and that we should allow it to be taken by the West to the extent of its share whenever the West wants it. We never until to-day have had an opportunity to carry out what we have said—what we have promised. This is the first opportunity, and I embrace it. I am not afraid, sir, as an eastern man to go home to my constituents in Maine or anywhere else in New England if need be, and to stand by this proposition. As explained by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] there is no real inflation in it. That being so, I abandon no principle in my vote.

I wish, as does the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] that the committee of conference could have agreed to put on the clause here fixing resumption at some early day. But I am free to say on this, as on the matter of inflation pure and simple, I am more hopeful as to the future than some other gentlemen. I believe that question of resumption will in a large degree take care of itself. If gentlemen from the West will pardon me for an expression of opinion upon the sentiment of a people whom they know more about than I do, I believe that in the hearts of the American people East and West the proposition of as early resumption as is practicable is favored. I wish we had it here in the bill, but as it is absent the people must take care that it be not long postponed. It is a proposition that I predict will grow in favor. To me it is clear that all sentiment tending in any way to a lowering of our currency or our national credit has seen its high-water mark. So we can be generous. The least we can do as eastern men is to give to the West the opportunity to take their share of the banking currency. Their business demands it. It is something to escape the reproach of selfishness, whether that reproach is warranted or not.

Mr. DAWES. I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.]

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, though this bill will take some of the banking currency from the State which I have the honor in part to represent, I shall vote for it and will do it cheerfully. It does not propose to retire any of the greenbacks or to fix arbitrarily a day for the resumption of specie payment. It does not, it is true, add to the volume of currency, but it does open a way for the use of that which is now uselessly locked up in bank vaults or is put into circulation fraudulently and illegally.

What I desire to say is that I protest against the assertion of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] that we will have to come through contraction to his hard-money doctrine, and that of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] that the demand for more currency and a system which will give elasticity to our fixed and inelastic currency has been silenced and will never again be heard, and in the name of the Center, the West, and the South, with which the power of empire dwells, to give notice and assurance that from session to session and from election to election the issue will be made until the Government shall be found to reside in the will of the whole people and not in that of the small fraction of the people who reside east of the Hudson and in the minor money centers of the country.

[Mr. MARSHALL addressed the House. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I have heretofore, as a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, found myself unable to support, either in committee or in this House, any bill on this subject that has emanated from that source, because there has not yet been such a bill that did not propose to extend and increase what I consider the great evil of the hour, the banking system; and every one of these bills has had the additional objection that while increasing the issue of circulation to the national banking associations, and thus enlarging the profits of a favored few, it took care to diminish the greenbacks and substitute an interest-bearing indebtedness of the Government.

Now, sir, there are three features in this bill which especially commend themselves to me and which will induce me to support it. I wish there could have been added another feature that I very much desire, the fixing of a time for resumption.

The first feature which commands my approval is that which provides for doing away with the reserves of the banks upon their circulation. I have never yet been able to see any reason for those reserves. We have behind the national-bank circulation bonds, the market value of which to-day averages, I believe, one hundred and fifteen to one hundred dollars of face value. There is no authority of law to issue as banking circulation more than 90 per cent. of the face value of those bonds. Therefore the people who in the course of business are obliged to take the national-bank notes have at this time a margin of 25 per cent. to protect them in case of the failure of any bank.

The next feature of the bill which I heartily commend is the provision for settling at once the volume of greenback currency at $382,000,000. I, like the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MARSHALL,] have uniformly denied the right of the Secretary of the Treasury either to increase or to diminish the volume of the greenback circulation; and that provision of this bill which recommends it to me more perhaps even than the redistribution feature is the clause taking away from any Secretary of the Treasury the power, (through misjudgment if he be honest or from interested motives if he be dishonest,) to change the volume of the currency according to his judgment or caprice.

I now come to the third feature of this bill—the provision for a redistribution of the national banking currency. I have stood here voting and speaking steadfastly against any increase of the volume of the currency, either the national-bank issues or the greenbacks. There is no increase of either description of circulation in this bill. The amount of greenbacks and the amount of national banking association circulation continue the same as now. The allegation that this bill is inflation has no force or truth whatever. But while this has been my position, I have said to gentlemen on all sides that whenever they would give me the chance I would vote for an honest redistribution of the banking circulation throughout the country. I have been sincere in those declarations, and I mean to be sincere in my vote to-day. No reason in the world can be presented to this House or the country why one section of the nation should have an advantage in respect to the national-bank circulation over another section. Under the distribution which we have had heretofore New England, New York, and my own State have for a long time had an undue proportion of this circulation, with the profits accruing therefrom, while the South has languished and the West has been unable to secure the facilities which would transport her crops to the seaboard. I maintain that no just man can deny to the South and the West this redistribution. More than that, I believe that great good will result from it. The South will have facilities for banking, and she will bloom and blossom as of old. The West will once more be satisfied as to the amount of her banking circulation and her money facilities, and she will again prosper. So that in the future we shall have nothing to do but to fix a day of resumption, when the greenback shall be the equal of gold and when the bank-note shall be the representative of the greenback.

THE CURRENCY.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the currency question.

Mr. MARSHALL. I now yield for five minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.]

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, a great part of this bill is broth or froth. There is no strong meat in it for anybody. I do not think such a measure ought to pass. It will give no substantial relief.

Indeed my honored friend from Illinois, [Mr. MARSHALL,] under whose pleasant courtesy I speak, has told you that this is no final settlement. It is only an expedient. It is a mere make-shift. It is poor, pitiful, impotent, unprincipled patch-work. I will not vote for it.

I will vote in favor of no proposition until I see something which is based upon solid sense and definite principle. My principle is laid down in our party platforms of 1872. Your republican platform is before me. It was adopted at Philadelphia in 1872; and it "confidently expected our excellent national currency will be protected by a speedy resumption of specie payment!" O! O! How good and smooth! and yet how delusive!

The democratic platform was adopted in July, 1872. It declared the ineradicable, traditional, economical, rational, and constitutional sentiment of the grand party of the past and future. What does it say? "A speedy return to specie payment is demanded alike by the highest considerations of commercial morality and honest government." Where are ye, platform manufacturers? Where is your "commercial morality?" Where is your "honest government?" Who are the leaders? Where are the leaders of our brave and honest party? Where are they? Who is about me to display the honest banner? These are not declarations by one party. They are by both parties. O, my Christian brethren! O, my democratic brethren! What chances you are missing! What opportunities you will hereafter regret not to have improved! Where is the honesty and morality that chinks and rings in the sterling talk and thought of our early representative men? It is not merely a question of paying your debts and avoiding repudiation. It is a question of constitutional and Federal honor. It concerns the very architects of our splendid fabric of government. How proud I am to be in a minority with the best of our early men and the sage men of our present day.

Mr. Speaker, why do you dabble here by this bill with the reserves and call it economy, when it is nothing but inflation? You wish to drink more for the luxury of being bloated. Why not, if you will have a bloat—why not do it with a square drink? May I refer to what my friend from Illinois has just said here? He would release just so much as is now tied up. He would not have inflation. O, no! but he would only release it for the present. Why, sir, we have a money glut now in New York and elsewhere. Bring your produce and values to New York, and you can get the money. If you want to indulge in real inflation, why whip the evil about the impediment? Take an honest inspiration, instead of indulging a vicious decoction, made up at the tail-end of the session for the mere purpose of saving your republican party from the charge of utter incompetency to deal with this paramount question.

The five minutes which I have will not suffice to show the partisan aspect of this measure. We are all partisan in one sense; but so long as we pretend to make platforms and keep up party discipline, so long will it be just and best to practice sincerity or repudiate our resolves. There are, I fear, however, two parties in trouble on this question. I do not see voting with me here democratic members from Ohio and other Western States, those old-time, hard-money, constitutional democrats with whom I was raised. Where are they now? Wherever they are, for one I shall give no vote for any measure which postpones gold and silver as a standard. I believe the time will come, under Providence, for speedy resumption. Labor will demand it. Commerce and agriculture will revolutionize for it. There is no power under heaven among men to give stability to business and society except we march toward gold and silver!

[Mr. MARSHALL again addressed the House. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. POTTER. I have asked the gentleman from Illinois for a minute in order to say, in the first place, I approve the conference report so far as it provides for a redistribution of the national banking circulation; and secondly, I favor that feature of it which restrains the power of the Secretary of the Treasury in respect of the issue of Treasury notes. I regret, however, that the general direction of the report is such that I am not able to cast my vote for it.

Mr. MARSHALL. I now yield for five minutes to my friend from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, the leading features of this measure are in striking contrast to the bills which have been heretofore considered by both branches of Congress during this session. The former measures, all of them, led to and contemplated a reduction of the legal-tender circulation, and at the same time to an increase of the issues of the national banks. The main object of those measures seemed to be to secure an early retirement of the greenback currency, the lawful money of the country, by funding the same in interest-bearing bonds, and to substitute in its place national-bank notes. Believing as I do that the high prerogative and enormous profits of issuing paper money belong to the whole people, I could not give those measures my support.

From the beginning of this session of Congress there has been a persistent determination of the national banks to drive out the legal-tender money and enlarge their already enormous wealth by monopolizing the exclusive right to furnish the money of the country. The addition of $356,000,000 to their wealth was no small motive to the banks to exercise their almost irresistible power in our legislation. They were not, it is true, satisfied with the bill that went to the President, for while it increased their capital $46,000,000 it left the greenbacks in the field, but in every succeeding measure they secured the fundamental concession that their notes should supersede greenbacks and that the burdens of the people should be increased by funding the greenbacks in interest-bearing bonds. No partial victory was sufficient; nothing less than an absolute monopoly of issuing money would satisfy the capitalists, who in the main dictate the enactment of our laws. But the temper of the people would not submit to this. The retirement of the greenbacks for the benefit of the banks would add nearly $20,000,000 a year in gold to the burdens of the tax-payers of the country. We approach the hour when the Representative must meet his constituents. And the pending measure is in striking contrast with its predecessors. It neither adds $46,000,000 to the bank capital, as the first bill did, nor does it almost double the wealth of the bondholders, as the so-called free-bank bill proposed, by issuing bank-notes and funding the greenbacks in gold interest-bearing and non-taxable bonds.

This measure has at least the merit, whatever else may be said against it, of actually increasing in its practical effect the volume of the legal-tender currency of the country. It will do it to the extent of at least $26,000,000, for in the absence of this legislation it is now well known that the moment the finances of the country would admit of it the greenbacks would be reduced from $382,000,000 to $356,000,000, and this bill prohibits that $26,000,000 being held by the Secretary of the Treasury as a reserve.

In addition to this the greenbacks held by the national banks as a reserve for the redemption of their notes are released by this bill and will enter into the circulation. The absurdity of this reserve of greenbacks to redeem national-bank notes is too manifest, as the faith of the nation and the wealth and honor of the whole people are alike pledged for the bankers' notes and the legal-tenders, the only difference being that the bankers' notes are issued for the benefit of the bankers at the expense of the people, and the legal-tenders are issued for the benefit of the whole people.

The bank reserve, as has been well shown, is without any merit whatever. It is and always has been a mere pretense, and yet it has reduced the actual amount of currency without in any degree increasing the security of the issues of the national banks. The faith of the nation secures that. This bill, then, does not enlarge either the power or the capital or the currency of the national banks. That is a feature which specially commends the measure to my judgment, and I believe will commend it to the country. I do not believe the people of the West desire to enlarge the power nor the currency of the national banks. They would enlarge the volume of their own lawful money. But this bill in another feature is an act of common justice to the West and the South in the partial equalization of the national-bank capital. If the equalization of this capital was complete $80,000,000 would be withdrawn from the money centers of the East and given to the West and South. This bill withdraws $55,000,000 of this bank capital from the East and gives it to the West and South. This neither increases the power, capital, nor circulation of the banks. It is but a temporary measure looking to the early future when in answer to the demands of the just public sentiment of the country the national-bank currency shall be retired and the money, the profits and benefits of which inure to the whole people—greenbacks—shall be substituted in its place. This, sir, would be a great victory for equal rights and justice for the people over the power of capital.

The gentleman from New York, and other gentlemen representing great commercial centers naturally resist this bill. For so far as the national-bank system is concerned, as has been well shown and seen, the effect of the bank system is to centralize your currency at the commercial centers. New York, of course, will have money to loan at 3½ and 4 per cent. And why? Because the national-bank system, with all its centralizing agencies extending through the whole country, concentrates there the wealth and currency of the nation. I will without hesitation give this bill my support.

Mr. STORM. How does this bill prevent it?

Mr. HOLMAN. Under the provisions of this bill there will be manifestly less of this centralizing power than under the present system of reserves, which by existing law is held at the money centers. But the great measure of justice is yet to be secured, the substitution of greenbacks for the national-bank paper and reducing the burdens of the public debt at least $20,000,000 a year, and giving to the whole people the wealth that capital now monopolizes to itself.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, in all the votes that I have cast on the currency question during this Congress I have steadily adhered to the principle that gold is the only legitimate money, and the only safe money to secure the prosperity of the country and maintain unsullied its honor and integrity; that since, as a relic of the war, we are compelled to use an irredeemable paper currency, it is absolutely necessary that its volume should not be expanded, if we are to look forward to a return to specie. While I sympathize with the sufferings of the West and South from the paralysis of industry that prevails throughout the country, I do not believe that a further debasement and expansion of currency will afford them substantial relief. Expansion will not aid the industrial classes; it is only a concession to speculation and the profits of capital.

The prostrate condition of the country is rather owing to the misgovernment of the ruling party, and relief can only be obtained by economy in public administration and integrity and good faith in official life. This bill is a further prop to the national banking interest, which is the most gigantic monopoly known to any country. Before its stature every interest dwindles into insignificance. It is the stronghold of capital, and so long as it maintains its financial power, labor and industry will remain prostrate. I favor the redistribution of the currency, but this conference measure, while it gives that sop to Cerberus, postpones indefinitely the return to specie, and overrides the law which fixed the volume of the legal-tender currency at $356,000,000. I will vote against it, and look forward to a triumph of the democratic party as the only harbinger and guarantee to the people of a return to the sound financial policy of free banking based on gold and silver coin.

[Mr. KELLOGG addressed the House. His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. MAYNARD. I shall vote for this report. It contains beneficent provisions, in my judgment, but at the same time I accept the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSHALL] that it is not a settlement of the question.

The settlement of this question of the currency will have one of two results: free banking on the one hand, or else the annihilation of the present national-bank system. That is the alternative that is before us, and I beg gentlemen to bear that in mind in all their action upon the currency question.

And now, in conclusion, if I can be allowed to say a word to my friend from Connecticut, [Mr. KELLOGG,] I would say that he reminds me of a medical friend of mine who once had a favorite nurse who was noted for never denying his patients anything, but he always coupled his compliance with the condition "not just now, for the doctor thinks it would not be good for you at present."

Mr. KELLOGG. That is just right; you need just such a nurse.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. MAYNARD. I call for the yeas and nays on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 221, nays 40, not voting 28; as follows:

So the report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, (when his name was called.) I vote "ay" with a mental reservation.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I am requested to state that my colleague, Mr. MCDILL, is confined to his room by illness. If present he would vote for this report.

Mr. POLAND. Mr. Speaker, upon this question I have not voted. Upon questions affecting legislation in regard to national banks generally I have felt entitled to vote, although the president of a national bank and a stockholder in it. This bill provides for taking away a portion of the circulation of certain banks, of which the bank with which I am connected will be one. I have therefore felt that I am personally interested in this question, so much so as to come within the rule, and I do not vote.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. SHOEMAKER, is absent on account of a death in his family; if present he would vote "ay."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the report of the committee of conference was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

IMPEACHMENT OF JUDGE BUSTEED.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted a report and resolutions in the matter of the impeachment of Richard Busteed, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Alabama; which was recommitted to the committee, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CESSNA also, by unanimous consent, submitted the views of the minority of the committee; which were ordered to be printed.

IMPEACHMENT OF JUDGE STORY, OF ARKANSAS.

Mr. CESSNA. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be directed to furnish to the Attorney-General, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Third Auditor and the First Comptroller of the Treasury copies of the evidence taken by the Judiciary Committee of the House in the matter of the impeachment of Hon. William Story, judge of the United States court for the western district of Arkansas, for their information and guidance, with the recommendation, that such action be taken by the said Departments as will restore to the Treasury of the United States any moneys wrongfully paid to any of the officers of said court, and to prevent any such wrongful payments hereafter.

Mr. SENER. I desire to move an amendment to this resolution.

Mr. CESSNA. I will hear it read.

Mr. SENER. I move to insert after the word "Arkansas" these words:

And also to each of said officers a copy of the testimony taken before the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice as to the expenses, disbursements, and general management of the western district of Arkansas, since July, 1870.

Mr. CESSNA. I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to; and the resolution, as amended, was adopted.

LOUISIANA CONTESTED-ELECTION CASES.

Mr. LAMAR, from the Committee on Elections, reported the following preamble and resolution; which were read, considered, and adopted:

Whereas it is necessary to a proper determination of the several contests from the congressional districts of Louisiana, now pending in the House, that the Committee on Elections should be in possession of the original election returns of the general election held in that State on the 4th day of November, 1872; and whereas those returns are said to be in the possession of John McEnery, and said McEnery being unwilling to produce said returns except upon order of said committee: Therefore,

Be it resolved by this House, That a subpœna duces tecum be issued to said McEnery, requiring him to produce in person before said committee said election returns on or before the first Monday in December, 1874; and also that subpœnas be issued to Archibald Mitchell and William Wareper, of New Orleans, requiring them to be and appear before said Committee on Elections on the first Monday in December, A. D. 1874.

ELECTION CONTEST—BELL VS. SNYDER.

Mr. CROSSLAND. I am instructed by the Committee on Elections to report the following resolution for action at this time:

Resolved, That the contestant, M. S. Bell, in the contested-election case from the second congressional district of Arkansas, be allowed thirty days after the adjournment of the present session of the Forty-third Congress, without further amending his notice of contest, to take further testimony in reference to the vote of Hempstead and Hot Spring Counties; and the contestee, O. P. Snyder, shall have twenty days after the expiration of the said thirty days allowed the contestant, to take testimony by rebuttal in relation to the vote in said two counties, this testimony to be taken on ten days' notice served on the parties respectively.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. In my judgment that resolution should not pass. On behalf of the minority I protest against its passage, and ask for the yeas and nays on it.

The SPEAKER. The resolution cannot be received except by unanimous consent.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. Then I object.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will not be received.

BONDS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I respectfully invite the attention of Congress to one feature of the bill entitled "An act for the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes." Provision is therein made for the payment of the debts of the District in bonds to be issued by the sinking-fund commissioners, running fifty years and bearing interest at the rate of 3.65 per cent. per annum, with the payment of the principal and interest guaranteed by the United States.

The government by which these debts were created is abolished, and no other provision seems to be made for their payment. Judging from the transactions in other bonds, there are good grounds, in my opinion, for the apprehension that bonds bearing this rate of interest when issued will be worth much less than their equivalent in the current money of the United States. This appears to me to be unjust to those to whom these bonds are to be paid, and to the extent of the difference between their face and real value, looks like repudiating the debts of the District. My opinion is that to require creditors of the District of Columbia to receive these bonds at par when it is apparent that to be converted into money they must be sold at a large discount, will not only prove greatly injurious to the credit of the District, but will reflect unfavorably upon the credit and good faith of the United States.

I would recommend, therefore, that provision be made at the present session of Congress to increase the interest upon these bonds, so that when sold they will bring an equivalent in money, and that the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to negotiate the sale of these bonds at not less than par and pay the proceeds thereof to those who may be ascertained to have valid claims against the District of Columbia.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, June 20, 1874.

Mr. KASSON. Is the bill referred to in the message returned to the House?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I move that the message be printed and referred to the Joint Select Committee on the Affairs of the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORT ON VIENNA COMMISSION.

Mr. DONNAN. I report from the Committee on Printing the following resolution:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That of the reports of the United States commissioners to the Vienna exposition, there shall be printed, under the direction of the Secretary of State, four thousand copies for the House, two thousand copies for the Senate, and one thousand copies for the Secretary of State.

Mr. HOLMAN. This large increase of public documents of course indicates very clearly——

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman objects the resolution cannot be entertained.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object.

Mr. DONNAN. Does a single objection prevent the resolution from being reported?

The SPEAKER. It does. The House is acting under a suspension of the rules on business upon the Speaker's table, and anything else must be by unanimous consent or of higher privilege.

ASSISTANT DISBURSING CLERK.

Mr. ARCHER, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Accounts the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the salary of the assistant disbursing-clerk of the House be fixed at the same rate with the assistant Journal clerk, and that the Committee on Appropriations provide for the payment of the same.

LOUIS V. BOGY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, there are a great many of these amendments, and I presume it will not be necessary for me to go over them all. The majority of them are unimportant in their character. The Senate increased the amount of the appropriations in this bill about $450,000. The committee of conference have, of course, as such committees are required to do, compromised. The increase as the bill comes from the committee of conference is $250,000 over the amount in the bill we sent to the Senate. This increase is mostly upon two or three items. The Senate increased the amount appropriated to the Apaches of Arizona from $450,000, the amount fixed by the House, to $700,000. After two days' consultation the committee of conference agreed as a compromise to settle upon $550,000, thus dividing the difference between the two Houses. I desire to say in my own vindication that I have not changed my own opinion as to what the amount should be; but I agreed to this amount because, as every gentleman knows, there are two branches of Congress, equal in their powers and authority; and as the Senate insisted upon $700,000 and the House upon $450,000, we were obliged to compromise our differences. The committee of conference thought that the best we could do in this case was to divide the difference.

The next most important increase is with reference to the Crow Indians of the North. The House committee had fixed $50,000 as the appropriation for the Crows, although the Department had recommended $100,000. When the House committee acted on this question it was supposed, and I think my colleague on the committee [Mr. PARKER, of Missouri,] will confirm this statement, that by a certain treaty which had been made since that time those Indians would get $50,000 outside of this bill. This turns out to be a mistake; the treaty was not ratified. Hence the committee of conference have concluded it would not be particularly out of the way to give the Crows the amount proposed by the Senate.

There is a slight increase—$30,000 I think—in the amount of the contingent fund for California, and about the same increase in the contingent fund for Arizona.

I have now mentioned the only important items in the bill which have been increased by the present report. I think the best thing the House can do is to agree to the report. It will leave as the amount appropriated by this bill $5,265,000. The corresponding bill of last year appropriated $5,379,000; so that this bill appropriates between one and two hundred thousand dollars less than the bill of last year. The bill of the year before last appropriated $7,900,000. Thus the House will see that we are decreasing annually our Indian appropriations. I do not desire to occupy further the time of the House. I yield a moment to my friend from Missouri, [Mr. PARKER.]

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry to be put in the position of being obliged to disagree on this report with my friend from Iowa [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE] and my other colleague on the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. HERN-

DON,] because we have all labored assiduously upon the Indian bill during the whole of the present session in order to perfect it.

I desire to say in the commencement of my remarks (in the course of which I shall give my reasons for disagreeing to this report) that in every other bill which has come from the Committee on Appropriations during this session of Congress, and which has been adopted by this House, there has been a large decrease in the appropriations compared with those that were made by the last Congress for the present fiscal year. There was a large decrease in this Indian appropriation bill as it went from the hands of this House to the Senate. The sub-committee of the Committee on Appropriations, in preparing this bill, criticised everything in the closest manner, so that they might save to the Treasury everything possible, without being at all desirous of crippling the Indian service, but on the contrary being friendly to that service and the peace policy under which it is managed.

If this report is adopted this bill goes to the country as the only one in which there is no substantial reduction. It is true there is a reduction of $100,000 and a fraction over the bill of last year, but no more. This is not the fault of the House; this is not the fault of my colleagues on this sub-committee. It comes in that way from the other end of the Capitol.

Upon this branch of the case I desire to give the reason why I cannot agree on this report. The Crow appropriation, which has been increased, to which the gentleman has referred, is proper. I think the House voted $50,000 on the understanding there was an agreement which would be ratified by the Congress of the United States with these Indians giving them $50,000 instead of $31,000. That agreement has not been reached. Therefore I think it proper to appropriate this amount.

The material point in this bill is in reference to the Apaches of Arizona and New Mexico. How does that stand? It will be remembered by the House that the last Congress appropriated for this service $250,000. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs came to the Committee on Appropriations on the 18th of last December and asked we should give $200,000 more as a deficiency for the present fiscal year. The committee, after investigating it, became satisfied that amount would run the service for the remaining portion of this fiscal year, and agreed to give that $200,000.

Now, upon this point I desire to trespass upon the attention of the House by reading the letters of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. On this point I invite especial attention of the House. I refer to this because it makes up the aggregate that went to supply that service this year, and upon that amendment the sub-Committee on Appropriations took this as a basis and agreed to give this service for the coming fiscal year $450,000. What is the letter of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs? Let me read:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C., December 18, 1873.

SIR: By the Indian appropriation act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, (Statutes at Large, volume 17, page 440) the sum of $250,000 was appropriated to subsist and properly care for the Apache Indians in Arizona and New Mexico who have been or may be collected on reservations, the amount to be expended for each person not to exceed $100 per annum.

Of the amount thus appropriated there remains now on hand only $10,603.26, all of which will be needed for pay of employés at the respective agencies.

It will be remembered by the House that on the 18th of last December, when half of the fiscal year had gone, there was of the $250,000 to run the service, $10,000 remaining. But let me read further:

To meet absolute necessities for the subsistence and support of the Apaches up to the 30th of June next, including incidental expenses and transportation, will require at least $200,000, which, added to the amount heretofore appropriated, will make the total expenditure for the fiscal year in this branch of the service equal to $450,000, or $64.28 per capita, estimating the number of Indians subsisted and to be subsisted at seven thousand, which is as near the correct average as can be ascertained from present information on the subject.

I have the honor to present herewith an estimate for that amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary for the purposes referred to, and to recommend the same for your approval, and for submission to and favorable action by Congress.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. R. CLUM,
Acting Commissioner.

Hon. SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

Now I desire to call the attention of the House to this fact: On the 18th of December, while we were in session here, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs came before the Committee on Appropriations and told us all the money he required to complete the service for this fiscal year was $200,000 in addition to the $250,000 already given to him by the regular appropriation bill of last year. He said emphatically in his letter that would complete the service up to the 30th day of June next. The committee gave him this additional $200,000, but when the deficiency bill went into the Senate we find added to this $200,000 $300,000 more. We find also distinguished men of that body in the conference insisting instead of giving $200,000 we should give $500,000. For one I protest against it, and I do it in the interest of that economy which all of us have been trying to practice here.

The Commissioner himself, in his letter of the 18th of December, 1873, says that $450,000 will run the service for this fiscal year. He understands his business. He knew what he was about then. We complied with his request, and we took the amount that was asked for and given by our bill last year as a basis for making up the bill this year, and in it we put $450,000. But what does the Senate do? Does the Senate leave that $450,000 remaining there? O, no; when it goes over to that body they put it up to $700,000. They say they did it upon the judgment of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. They have put it up to $700,000 upon the judgment of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. Let us see how correct they are in that assertion. Why, here are the revised estimates coming from the Indian Department to this Congress on the 5th of January, 1874, in which the Commissioner only asks for $550,000 for that service, and the Senate actually put in the bill $150,000 more than he asks for. And then we are asked in this House to indorse that.

Mr. AVERILL. Is the gentleman aware that the amount now asked for is exactly in accordance with the estimates made by the Commissioner?

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. The gentleman does not understand me. I say that the Commissioner asks for a less sum by $150,000 than the Senate have inserted in this bill. I assert that as a fact. The Senate amended this bill for that service in New Mexico and Arizona by putting it up to $700,000; and now the question comes up in the conference committee whether we will agree to what was the judgment of the sub-committee of the Committee on Appropriations when we made up the bill, and what was the deliberate judgment of the whole Committee on Appropriations when that bill was made up? For one I have protested against it, and for one I will not be held responsible by the country for thus increasing the expenditures when I do not conscientiously believe it is necessary.

I have detained the House upon this matter because it is a vital matter; because on it turn the appropriations in two bills, that in the deficiency bill and that in the regular bill.

Now, it may be said that some subsequent letter will be produced here by the Commissioner. I do not know how that may be in reference to these deficiencies, but before I am satisfied in regard to it I want to see what amounts of money have been expended and the vouchers for those expenditures.

Do gentlemen know how much we appropriate for this service this year? Why, sir, in several items covering old deficiencies you appropriate in the deficiency bill $423,000 for deficiencies for the years 1872 and 1873. You appropriate, as it stood in the bill when it passed the House, $200,000 for deficiencies for this year. And now you are asked by the Senate in that deficiency bill to appropriate $300,000 more, and in a regular bill here before us you are asked to appropriate $100,000 more as it is reported from the conference committee.

Gentlemen tell us we must give way and must agree. Well, sir, $100,000 upon this one branch of this service alone is a very considerable amount of money, and if you are to agree to the dictum of the other end of the Capitol and keep on agreeing to it, instead of reducing the expenditures for the Indian service you will increase them year by year. There has been no substantial reduction to this bill as it comes back, there will be no substantial reduction next year, and so the work goes on. They have suddenly discovered that there are nine thousand Indians to be fed. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs said upon the 18th of December last that there were but seven thousand of these Indians. It seems that there have been two thousand captured since that time and brought on the reservation, and yet I have seen no evidence of that fact.

I stand here, sir, willing to give all the money that is necessary to carry on the service and to conduct it properly, but I am unwilling that more shall be given for this service than is necessary. Only the other day the members of this House were frightened out of their propriety and voted against a proposition by the statement that the lobby was full of men interested in what was a very proper measure. If it was right thus to refer to the matter of the lobby, I can say now that since this bill has been pending and the deficiency bill containing appropriations for the Indians, this city has been besieged by lobbyists in the interest of Indian contractors, who have been trying all the while to get the amount of money appropriated in these bills increased. And, sir, when they failed in the House they went to the other end of the Capitol, and there they succeeded. Sir, I protest against the increase of this appropriation, in the face of the fact that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs told us on the 18th of December, by his solemn letter, that it required only $450,000 to run this service last year; and if it only required that amount last year, there is no evidence before us of any character worthy of credence going to show that any more money will be required for the coming year. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs came before us with another letter, stating that there was a deficiency running back for a series of years prior to the fiscal year of 1872–'73, requiring an appropriation of $423,000, a deficiency which had accumulated year by year.

Now, sir, the House can do just as it pleases on this question. I, for one, propose to vote against the report of the committee of conference, and I propose, for one, to assist if I can in maintaining the dignity and power of this House, especially when it is asserted in favor of economy.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I do not think my friend from Missouri takes a proper view of this case. I do not think the House has more dignity than the Senate. I claim that it has as much; but we have no right to set ourselves up and say that when they desire to have an amendment made to a bill they are trampling upon us. Sir, they are our peers. They think that $700,000 is necessary for this purpose; the House thought that $450,000 was necessary. We have agreed to compromise and divide the difference, allowing $500,000. Now these same Indians had appropriated for them $600,000 the year before last and they had $600,000 last year. There was a deficiency for the last year which we shall have to pay, and in order to show this I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
Washington, D. C., June 18, 1874.

SIR: Referring to the deficiency estimates of this office for the Apaches in Arizona and New Mexico, namely, one for $200,000 and one for $300,000, I desire to state for your information that the remark in office letter submitting the first-named amount, to the effect that that sum would be required for the remainder of the present fiscal year, was so stated inadvertently. It was really expected there would be two deficiency appropriations this year, same as last; and the first item was intended to meet the wants of the service up to the time the second deficiency bill should be prepared and ready to be reported to Congress, by which time the office would be able to estimate with more certainty for the amount that would actually be required for the whole year.

There is, in fact, now in this office a deficiency in the shape of vouchers, reports of indebtedness, and estimates from the agents at the various agencies in Arizona and New Mexico, as follows: For supplies already furnished and services rendered, represented by vouchers that have been presented for payment, $326,599.59; for beef that has been delivered and will be required till the 1st proximo, for which vouchers have not yet been presented, say, $73,821.20; for indebtedness reported by the agents and estimates submitted by them, to carry on the service to the 30th instant, in addition to the foregoing, $134,670.73; making in all, $535,091.52. This amount may be reduced somewhat by the actual returns of the agents; but it will readily be perceived that the full amount of $500,000 will be absolutely necessary to meet all the indebtedness that has been and will have been incurred on account of the service in Arizona and New Mexico during the present fiscal year.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

EDWARD P. SMITH,
Commissioner.

Hon. J. A. GARFIELD,
House of Representatives.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. The House will notice by that letter that these deficiencies certified to by the Commissioner as being on file in his office will bring the expenses for the present year up to $750,000, and that is more than $200,000 over what the conference committee report. It is more than the Senate insisted on, and the amount we now appropriate is $200,000 less than the expenses for the present year.

Now, as I said before, I do not differ with my friend from Missouri in his judgment on this matter at all. I agree with him perfectly, but I have lived long enough to know that I do not know everything myself, and that in this country other men know as much as I do, and that I must compromise my own opinions with those of other men. The two Houses of Congress must compromise their opinions, and I think it is a fair compromise between the House and the Senate to split the difference.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let me give the reasons why the Senate insisted on their amendment in this case. They say that there are nine thousand of these Apaches; they say that they are the wildest and most savage tribe on the continent; they say that for years they have been butchering the settlers in Arizona; and they say that since the peace policy has been in force there have been no butcheries. They say we have taken these Apaches and hemmed them in on reservations, and we must feed them or they will leave those reservations and go again to murdering the people.

There are nine thousand of these Indians. Now sit down and figure a little. If you give to these Indians twenty cents a head for the whole year it will make nearly $100,000 more than the committee have agreed upon. What the committee have agreed upon is only seventeen cents a day for each Apache Indian during the year. Certainly that will not feed them very liberally. I act upon the presumption that the rolls of the Department and the rolls returned by the Army show the true number of Indians. I might differ with them; but, as I said before, I might differ with a great many men, and we must compromise our differences. I ask that this report be agreed to.

Mr. HANCOCK. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a few moments.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I will do so.

Mr. HANCOCK. I desire to say a few words in addition to what has been said by my colleague on the committee in relation to the Apache Indians in Arizona and New Mexico. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PARKER] seems to take a single statement and to adhere inflexibly to that statement as the only one upon which he will predicate our action here. The statement to which he refers as having been made by the then Acting Commissioner on the 18th of December last has been corrected twice, I believe, in formal communications, and perhaps a dozen times verbally, as an inadvertent misstatement of the facts and of the actual needs of the Indian service in that regard. The fact is that the deficiency, instead of being $200,000, was really over $500,000; and it is necessary that that amount should be appropriated if the Government is to keep faith with the contractors who have furnished supplies to these Indians.

I do not know how much fidelity or the absence thereof may exist in connection with the administration of the law in reference to these Indians. If, however, the reports we receive of them from officers of the Army and the officers of the Government having charge of the Indian service are to be relied upon, these Indians are not less than seven thousand and perhaps as many as nine thousand in number. If there be but seven thousand of them, the amount proposed to be appropriated by this bill will be only twenty-one cents and a fraction per head. It is impossible that there can be much margin for thieving or for extravagant squandering of money if that number of Indians are kept upon the reservations and fed from this fund. The expense of getting supplies there is probably almost as great as anywhere in the whole country. I do not know any place where it would be greater, or even as great as it is there. This is below the average cost of a ration in any portion of the country where the Government of the United States supplies rations to feed any part of the human family.

I have nothing to say about the deficiency appropriation bill, which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PARKER] seems more disposed to combat than the bill now under consideration. I think it is sufficient for me at least to leave that matter in the hands of the very competent gentlemen who have charge of it. If we perform our duties with regard to this matter it will be as much as devolves upon us, and probably as much as it would be worth while for us to undertake on this occasion.

Taking, then, the statements we received in reference to the number of these Indians, we know that the amount here appropriated, $550,000, is not too much money. I beg leave to correct also another statement of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. PARKER,] that the amount estimated for was $450,000. I have seen no such estimate, and I do not think any such has been brought to the attention either of the Committee on Appropriations or the sub-committee who have had charge of the Indian appropriation bill. In the first instance the estimates were for $750,000 as the amount necessary to feed the Indians in the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico. According to my recollection, and I do not think I can be mistaken, the revised estimates are $550,000. The Commissioner came afterward before us and said that would be insufficient. You have put a provision in this bill that there shall be no division. You will jeopardize the peace of these Territories if you do not make an appropriation sufficient to feed these Indians for the next year.

My own opinion is that the Senate was nearer right than we were. I do not believe that $700,000 was a dollar too much to appropriate for the purpose of feeding the Indians in New Mexico and Arizona, if we are going to carry out in good faith the peace policy of the Government; and I may remark here parenthetically that that is not our policy; but as it has been adopted by the Government, I am disposed to give it a fair, honest, and bona fide test. I believe if it is faithfully administered it will be found much cheaper than to feed, fight, and kill these Indians, apart from the question of humanity which is involved. One regiment of cavalry would cost more than $1,000,000 a year to be kept there. And one regiment would not suffice to compel peace if you force these Indians to leave the reservations and again go to committing depredations.

I would ask the gentleman from Missouri if he has forgotten the scenes of 1870 and 1871, and even up to 1872, when these Indians were butchering the inhabitants of these Territories, were taking their children captives, were desolating the whole Territory, and were finally arrested in their deeds only by the interposition of the army under the command of General Crook, I believe, aided by General Howard, and finally brought upon a reservation, and the principle of feeding them adopted instead of fighting them. And from that time to the present we have had peace with them.

That little collision with the Indians cost us more than $2,000,000 in a single year. As a question of economy, then, if it be necessary to appropriate this amount of money to furnish provisions for these Indians, I say that the bill does not appropriate a dollar too much; and I honestly believe that the amount is not enough.

Mr. BECK. I would like to ask the gentleman one question. What has become of the peace commission? There are some painful rumors about it.

Mr. HANCOCK. I am unable to answer the gentleman's inquiry further than to say that I learn from the newspapers (and I presume the statement is reliable) that for some reason the peace commissioners have resigned. I suppose that probably one reason is that they had performed their duty as long as the novelty, the dignity, and the romance afforded a sufficient attraction to keep them in the service. They received no compensation; and I have very little confidence that any service will last for a great while and be efficiently administered unless there is some compensation given. I do not know anything more than this except in the shape of rumors, which I do not care to repeat.

Mr. COX. I would like the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] to answer his own question. From the smile upon his face, I think he knows what has become of the peace commissioners.

Mr. HANCOCK. I presume that the places of these men will be supplied by those who, if not as good men, will probably perform their duties as well as they are able; and perhaps the interests of the Government may not materially suffer.

Mr. BECK. If the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HANCOCK] will allow me, I will say that according to my belief these peace commissioners were so terribly in the way of the Indian agents who desire to send in false vouchers and receive payment of fraudulent accounts that they had to be dismissed because they kept down the stealing. That is the way I understand it.

The question being taken on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference, there were—ayes 75, noes 36; no quorum voting.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the House ask for a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses. I will add that I do not wish to be a member of the committee of conference.

The motion of Mr. GARFIELD was agreed to.

PAY OF HOUSE EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. HOSKINS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund, the committee clerks, folders, pages, and other employés of the House for the full month of June, 1874.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution and a bill of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 112) directing the Public Printer to keep an account of all expenditures for printing, mailing, and binding the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, &c.; and

An act (H. R. No. 2655) to provide for the establishment of life-saving stations and houses of refuge upon the sea and lake coasts of the United States, and to promote the efficiency of the life-saving service.

GOLD BANKS.

Mr. MAYNARD. I am requested by the Representatives from the Pacific coast to ask that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of a bill that was reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency at an early day of this session, and that the bill be put on its passage. It is House bill No. 975 to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870.

On this subject I have received from the gentlemen representing the Pacific coast on this floor the following letter:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., June 6, 1874.

SIR: Impressed with the belief that the interests of our constituents urgently demand the passage at the present session of House bill No. 975, we respectfully request that you avail yourself of the earliest opportunity that may present itself to call it up for consideration.

Very respectfully,

S. O. HOUGHTON,
C. W. KENDALL,
J. K. LUTTRELL,
H. F. PAGE,
CHARLES CLAYTON,
J. W. NESMITH.

Hon. HORACE MAYNARD.

This bill relates to gold banks; and its only effect is to allow them to have circulating notes at the rate of 90 per cent. instead of 80 per cent. on the bonds deposited as security. With this view the bill proposes to amend the third section of the act of July 12, 1870.

That section now reads as follows:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That upon the deposit of any United States bonds, bearing interest payable in gold, with the Treasurer of the United States, in the manner prescribed in the nineteenth and twentieth sections of the national-currency act, it shall be lawful for the Comptroller of the Currency to issue to the association making the same circulating notes of different denominations, not less than five dollars, not exceeding in amount 80 per cent. of the par value of the bonds deposited, which notes shall bear upon their face the promise of the association to which they are issued to pay them, upon presentation at the office of the association, in gold coin of the United States, and shall be redeemable upon such presentation in such coin: Provided, That no banking association organized under this section shall have a circulation in excess of $1,000,000.

The bill was read. It provides that section 3 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870, be amended so as to read as follows:

SEC. 3. That upon the deposit of any United States bonds, bearing interest payable in gold, with the Treasurer of the United States, in the manner prescribed in the nineteenth and twentieth sections of the national currency act, it shall be lawful for the Comptroller of the Currency to issue to the association making the same circulating notes of different denominations, not less than five dollars, not exceeding in amount 90 per cent. of the par value of the bonds deposited, which notes shall bear upon their face the promise of the association to which they are issued to pay them, upon presentation at the office of the association, in gold coin of the United States, and shall be redeemable, upon such presentation, in such coin: Provided, That no banking association organized under this section shall have a circulation in excess of $1,000,000.

Mr. MAYNARD. It is the same as the law now with the exception of allowing 90 instead of 80 per cent.

Mr. HOLMAN. It increases the circulation, then, 10 per cent.

Mr. MAYNARD. It increases the gold circulation of the Pacific coast.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move there be an evening session for business, to begin at eight and a half o'clock. It is not necessary to meet as early as usual, but it is necessary we should have an evening session in order to get through with the business and be able to adjourn on Monday next. To do that the sundry civil appropriation bill should go to a committee of conference to-night. The Senate is now at work on it, and they propose to sit it out and pass it before taking a recess to-day. If we get here by eight and a half o'clock this evening we can take up the amendments to the sundry civil appropriation bill, act upon them, and send the bill to a conference to-night.

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Speaker, I object to a Sunday session under any circumstances. Let us meet here to-night so as not to have a Sunday session.

Mr. GARFIELD. As some gentlemen think we had better meet at eight o'clock instead of half-past eight o'clock, I now propose that we take a recess at half-past four o'clock until eight o'clock this evening.

Mr. KELLEY. I object.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to suspend the rules for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. A motion to suspend the rules is not in order, as the House is now acting under a suspension of the rules.

Mr. O'NEILL. I want to know whether gentlemen look to the possibility of a session on Sunday. I object to anything which will lead to our holding a session on Sunday. Let us have a session to-night to complete whatever business there may be to be done.

Mr. GARFIELD. I give notice that I will move to take a recess between four and five o'clock.

Mr. RANDALL. I should like to ask the Chair what he construes to be the operation of the concurrent resolution for adjourning on Monday next—whether the adjournment must take place on Monday at twelve o'clock or whether it will extend over until twelve o'clock on Tuesday, thus giving an additional day?

The SPEAKER. The Chair apprehends that question will not be left open for his decision. If no other order be made the only question to be decided is whether the adjournment shall take place at twelve o'clock midnight on Monday, or at the beginning of the legislative day at eleven o'clock on Tuesday. As between those two constructions the Chair has not made up his mind. The session could not by any possibility, in the judgment of the Chair, extend beyond eleven o'clock a. m. of Tuesday.

Mr. RANDALL. Could it by any possibility in the judgment of the Chair be that the adjournment could take place at twelve o'clock noon on Monday?

The SPEAKER. There is no presumption in favor of it. The only difference is, Monday next, the 22d, being fixed as the day of adjournment, whether it shall take place at the end of the calendar day, at midnight on Monday, or at the end of that legislative day, which is at eleven o'clock on Tuesday.

Mr. RANDALL. Then we might as well adjourn now, because we have a legislative day on Monday.

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly we have. We are not in the last legislative day of the session.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. But we wish to have conference committees appointed on the pending business before Monday next.

Mr. GARFIELD. The sundry civil appropriation bill will be over from the Senate, and we can consider the Senate amendments this evening and send the bill to a committee of conference before Monday.

Mr. POTTER. Suppose after the legislative day has begun on Monday next the Senate should adjourn at two o'clock, what would be the effect of that on the House?

The SPEAKER. That is a case which has never occurred.

Mr. POTTER. That is a question which has suggested itself to my mind.

The SPEAKER. That is a question, but the Chair apprehends the two Houses will necessarily agree upon the same hour of adjournment. It has never heretofore been otherwise.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to inform the House how the public business stands. We have just rejected a conference report, and therefore the Indian bill must go to a second conference. The deficiency appropriation bill is not yet quite completed in conference, but can be this evening. The post-office appropriation bill is not out of conference yet but will be ready for action this evening. Hence the necessity for an evening session to close up all these conference reports. If we expect to get away Monday or Tuesday we must before adjourning over Sunday send the sundry civil appropriation bill, which is a very long and very important one, to a committee of conference. The conferees will be compelled to use most of Sunday in arranging the details of conference, and the report can be made on Monday.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman has omitted to say anything about the river and harbor appropriation bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes; and there is the river and harbor appropriation bill, which is another conference we have to provide for.

Mr. KELLEY. I would like to state my reasons for objecting. The session can be extended for a day or two if necessary, and it will be much better if the important business we have to do shall be done deliberately rather than crowded through.

Mr. SPEER. Let us have no extension of the session; not one hour.

GOLD BANKS.

The question recurred on Mr. MAYNARD'S motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. MAYNARD. I will make, if the House will permit me, a brief statement in regard to the bill. The act of 1870 provided for the establishment of gold banks, allowing them to have only 80 per cent. in circulation. This bill, in the interest of the Pacific coast, proposes to amend that law so as to increase the amount to 90 per cent., the same as other national banks.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 375) for the benefit of the Kentucky Agricultural and Mechanical Association; and

An act (S. No. 688) referring the claim of the owners of the schooner Ada A. Andrews to the Court of Claims.

COMMERCIAL RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3770) to incorporate the Commercial Railway Company; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals, and ordered to be printed.

J. T. D. DUNCAN.

Mr. WALLACE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3771) for the relief of J. T. D. Duncan; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

MRS. GATES.

Mr. COX. I desire to make a motion in behalf of my friend from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] to take up the bill for the relief of Mrs. Gates and put it upon its passage. The case has been investigated by the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] and the bill ought to be passed.

Mr. DUNNELL. The Committee on Claims have unanimously instructed me to report it back.

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

BUSINESS ON THE SPEAKER'S TABLE.

The House then, under the order made yesterday, proceeded to the consideration of the business on the Speaker's table, to be disposed of by a two-thirds vote.

REGULATION OF GAS-WORKS.

The first business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 733) regulating gas-works, returned from the Senate with the amendments of the House disagreed to.

The House insisted on its amendments to the bill, and requested a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

GOLD MINT BARS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 784) authorizing the transfer of gold mint bars from the bullion fund of the assay office at New York to the assistant treasurer at New York, returned from the Senate with an amendment to the amendment of the House.

The amendment of the Senate to the amendment of the House was read, as follows:

Insert after the word "par" in line 8 the words "and not less than market value," instead of inserting the words "market value" after the word "at" in line 8 as proposed by the amendment of the House.

Mr. MERRIAM. I move that the amendment of the Senate be concurred in.

The amendment was concurred in.

MANDAMUS PROCEEDINGS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (H. R. No. 1273) to regulate proceedings in mandamus, returned from the Senate with amendments.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I move that that bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I hope the amendments of the Senate will be concurred in.

The SPEAKER. The first question will be upon concurring.

The amendments of the Senate were read, as follows:

Strike out after the word "may," in line 7, the words "be continued in the name of his" and insert "for the purposes of justice be revived against his."

Add as additional sections the following:

SEC. 2. That the circuit courts of the United States shall have, and are hereby given, power to issue the writ of mandamus in all causes at law or in equity of which they have jurisdiction, and in which such a writ by the common or the chancery law is an appropriate remedy, or by way of original proceeding where such writ is necessary to any jurisdiction possessed by said court and is a proper remedy.

SEC. 3. That this act shall have effect from the day of its passage.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and agreeing to the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. McCRARY. I desire to move an amendment to the Senate amendments.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Is it in order to move to refer this bill?

The SPEAKER. The first question is on concurring in the Senate amendments.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I hope the bill will not be passed. It is a bill that was defeated once.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. It has passed the House.

Mr. ELDREDGE. There are not ten members on the floor who know what the object of the bill is.

The SPEAKER. It is a House bill returned with Senate amendments.

Mr. McCRARY. I move to amend the Senate amendment by adding:

Any service of any writ or process in any proceeding by mandamus shall be deemed sufficient if made in accordance with the statute of the State in which such proceeding is commenced, regulating the service of similar process in the State courts.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to say simply——

Mr. ELDREDGE. I rise to a question of order. I suppose an amendment offered under these circumstances requires a two-thirds vote as well as any other proposition.

The SPEAKER. Of course, it is all settled by one vote, and if two-thirds do not vote for the amendment as proposed to be amended, the bill will remain on the table.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Every higher State court in the Union has the right to issue a writ of mandamus. This is only to give the circuit courts within the circuit of their own jurisdiction the same right.

Mr. ELDREDGE. It is a bill intended to take away the rights of the State courts.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. O, no; it does not alter the matter a hair except as I have said.

The question was taken upon agreeing to the Senate amendment as proposed to be amended; and upon a division there were—ayes 88, noes 56.

So (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof) the amendment was not concurred in, and the bill and amendment were returned to the Speaker's table.

MATTHIAS WHITEHEAD.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the amendment of the Senate to House bill No. 1774, for the relief of Matthias Whitehead.

The amendment of the Senate was to strike out all after "back pay" in line 6 to the end of the bill, and insert:

Due him to the 31st day of October, 1864, when he was ordered to return to duty, but he shall not be entitled to any bounty.

The amendment of the Senate was concurred in, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

COLLECTION OF DUES FROM PACIFIC RAILROADS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3282) providing for the collection of moneys due the United States from the Pacific Railroad Companies.

The amendments were to strike out all after "payment of," in line 2, down to and including line 8, and insert:

The railroad companies, their successors and assigns, or the successors and assigns of any or either of said companies, of all sums of money due or to become due the United States for the 5 per cent. of the net earnings provided for by the act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, or by any other act or acts in relation to the companies therein named, or any other such company or companies.

Line 10 strike out "a reasonable time" and insert "sixty days."

Line 14, after "collect" insert "or otherwise obtain redress in respect of."

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan. I move that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

The amendments were concurred in, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

JOHN DOLD.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate amendment to House bill 764, for the relief of John Dold.

The amendment of the Senate was to add to the bill the following:

Or the claim of any person in possession of or claiming the same; and also to fully indemnify the United States against all losses and damages in the premises.

Mr. ELKINS. I move that the amendment of the Senate be concurred in.

The amendment was concurred in, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

INSANE CONVICTS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate amendments to House bill No. 3415, to provide for the care and custody of persons convicted in the courts of the United States who have or may become insane while in prison.

The amendments of the Senate were to strike out all after "insane," in line 9, down to and including line 11; and also in line 15, after "insane," insert:

And there shall not be accommodation for such insane person at the Insane Asylum of the District of Columbia, or if for other reasons the Attorney-General is of the opinion that such insane person should be placed at the State insane asylum rather than at said District asylum, then.

After line 5, page 2, insert:

But no contract shall be made or compensation paid for the care of such insane persons beyond their respective terms of imprisonment.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I move that the amendments of the Senate be non-concurred in, and a committee of conference asked.

No objection was made, and it was so ordered.

UNSERVICEABLE ORDNANCE STORES.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate amendment to House bill No. 3257, authorizing the Secretary of War to sell unserviceable ordnance stores, and for other purposes.

The amendment of the Senate was to strike out the word "fixed" between the words "unserviceable" and "ammunition."

Mr. WHEELER. I move the amendment be concurred in.

The amendment was concurred in, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

HORSES DESTROYED IN MILITARY SERVICE.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate amendment to House bill No. 3428, to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the payment of horses and other property lost or destroyed in the military service of the United States," approved March 3, 1849.

The amendment of the Senate was to add the following section:

SEC. 2. That no claims under said section or this amendment shall be considered unless presented prior to the 1st day of January, 1876.

The amendment of the Senate was concurred in, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

RESERVATIONS IN ARIZONA.

The next business on the Speaker's table was Senate amendments to House bill No. 3431, authorizing the Secretary of War to relinquish and turn over to the Interior Department parts of certain reservations in the Territory of Arizona no longer required for military purposes.

The amendments of the Senate were to add to the bill the following:

Provided further, That bona fide settlers upon any part of said lands prior to the declaration of the reservation lines shall have the right to acquire title to the lands so occupied by them at said time, not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres each, under the land laws of the United States.

Also amend the title by inserting after "Arizona" the words "as may be."

Mr. McCORMICK. I move the amendments of the Senate be concurred in.

The amendments of the Senate were concurred in, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

REMOVAL OF CAUSES FROM STATE COURTS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (H. R. No. 3501) regulating the removal of causes from State courts to the circuit courts of the United States, returned from the Senate with amendments.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I move the Senate amendments be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

ISLAND IN SAGINAW RIVER, MICHIGAN.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (H. R. No. 2539) relinquishing the rights of the United States in certain lands in the State of Michigan, returned from the Senate with the following amendments:

In line 10, after the word "island," insert "saving and reserving to all persons or parties other than the United States any legal rights acquired therein," and at the end of the bill add the following proviso:

And provided further, That nothing contained in this act shall be construed to affect in any manner the rights of Stephen Marston, one of the proprietors and occupants of said middle ground.

So the bill will read:

That all rights and title of the United States to the middle ground or island in the Saginaw River, lying within the prescribed limits of fractional section 5, in township 13 north, of range 5 east, and sections 29 and 32, in township 14 north, of range 5 east, in the State of Michigan, and hereby relinquished to the riparian owners, respectively, of the lands on the shores of said river in front of or opposite to said island, saving and reserving to all persons or parties other than the United States any legal rights acquired therein: Provided, That this act shall not be construed or held to imply a claim of title on the part of the United States to said middle ground, but only as a relinquishment of any apparent right therein to the persons respectively to whom the lands on said shores were patented, their heirs and assigns.

And provided further, That nothing contained in this act shall be construed to affect in any manner the rights of Stephen Marston, one of the proprietors and occupants of said middle ground.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I move concurrence in the amendments of the Senate.

The amendments were concurred in.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 1572) fixing the amount of United States notes, providing for a redistribution of the national-bank currency, and for other purposes; and

An act (H. R. No. 2089) for the relief of Mrs. Louisa P. Molloy.

AMENDMENT TO HOMESTEAD LAW.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (H. R. No. 3354) to legalize entries of public lands under the homestead laws in certain cases, returned from the Senate with the following amendments:

After the word "lands" insert "heretofore," and at the end of the bill add the following proviso:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall have the effect or be construed to impair the valid and paramount adverse rights of any person or corporation to any of such lands, except in so far as the right of Congress to protect the claims or rights of homestead settlers upon land within the limits of grants of lands to any railroad company may have been reserved in the acts making such grants and be now lawfully existing.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. If there be no objection I move the Senate amendments be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LOWE. I hope the amendments of the Senate will be concurred in.

Mr. CLYMER. Let them go to the Committee on the Public Lands, and be printed.

Mr. KASSON. My belief is the proviso nullifies the bill. I ask it be read as it will stand if amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

That in all cases of entries of public lands heretofore made under the act entitled "An act to secure homesteads to actual settlers on the public domain," approved May 20, 1862, where the affidavit required by section 2 of said act was made before the clerk of the county of the residence of the person making the entry, without having first made the settlement and improvement required by the provisions of section 3 of the act entitled "An act amendatory of the homestead law, and for other purposes," approved March 21, 1864, said affidavits be, and the same are hereby, legalized and confirmed, so as to have the same force and validity as if the provisions of said last-named act had been strictly complied with: Provided, That nothing in this act shall have the effect or be construed to impair the valid and paramount adverse rights of any person or corporation to any of such lands, except in so far as the right of Congress to protect the claims or rights of homestead settlers upon land within the limits of grants of lands to any railroad company may have been reserved in the acts making such grants and be now lawfully existing.

Mr. ELDREDGE. The proviso seems to nullify the effect of the bill.

Mr. CASON. I move to suspend the rules and concur in the Senate amendments.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 80, noes 29.

So the motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

The rules were suspended, (two-thirds voting in favor thereof,) and the amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. PARKER of Missouri, Mr. LOUGHRIDGE of Iowa, and Mr. BECK of Kentucky as managers of the conference on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the Indian appropriation bill.

INUNDATION OF THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (H. R. No. 2988) to provide for the appointment of a commission of engineers to investigate and report a permanent plan for the reclamation of the alluvial basin of the Mississippi River subject to inundation, returned from the Senate with an amendment increasing the appropriation from $10,000 to $25,000.

The amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

MARSHAL FOR WESTERN JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF NORTH CAROLINA.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (H. R. No. 225) to amend the act entitled "An act to establish a western judicial district in North Carolina," returned from the Senate with an amendment.

The bill proposes to amend section 8 of the act of June 4, 1872, entitled "An act to establish a western judicial district of North Carolina," by adding thereto the following:

There shall also be appointed a marshal of the United States for said western district of North Carolina, who shall receive such fees and compensation and exercise such powers and perform such duties as are fixed and enjoined by law.

The amendment of the Senate is to strike out the following words at the end of the bill:

Receive such fees and compensation and exercise such powers and perform such duties as are fixed and enjoined by law,

And to insert:

Be entitled to a salary of $200 per annum; payment to be made quarterly out of the Treasury of the United States, and in addition thereto the fees of office fixed by law.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. I move that be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. POLAND. I move concurrence in the Senate amendment.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. Is it not open to the objection it makes an appropriation?

The SPEAKER. We are now proceeding under a suspension of the rules, which suspends that as well as all other rules.

Mr. POLAND. I will state what the bill is. When the western judicial district of North Carolina was established it was omitted to provide for a marshal. This merely provides in the western judicial district of North Carolina there shall be a marshal. The Senate have merely added a provision for the compensation of that marshal.

Mr. ELDREDGE. There is provision made here not merely for a marshal, but for all the officers of the court.

Mr. POLAND. The Senate only makes one change. We passed a bill in the House providing for a marshal; and the Senate have added on the ordinary provision as to the $200 salary.

Mr. ELDREDGE. We were assured that there would be no additional expense. That has always been the cry; and yet it always results in a new court-house.

The question being taken on suspending the rules and concurring in the Senate amendment, there were ayes 110, noes not counted.

So the amendments of the Senate were concurred in, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

UNITED STATES MARINE HOSPITAL AT PITTSBURGH, PENNSYLVANIA.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (H. R. No. 2787) to provide for the sale of the present United States marine hospital and site and the purchase of a new site and the erection thereon of a new marine hospital, in the city of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, with amendments by the Senate.

The first amendment was after the word "point," in line 14, to insert "and in accordance with designs to be prepared by the Supervising Architect to the satisfaction of the supervising surgeon of marine-hospital service and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury."

The next amendment was to strike out in line 27, after the word "provided," the words "the terms of sale of the present building will not admit of their remaining therein" and insert "it is practicable so to do; but in the event of such provision being found to be impracticable, then the present building shall be occupied for such patients."

Mr. NEGLEY. I move that the amendments of the Senate be concurred in.

The amendments of the Senate were concurred in, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

JAMES A. M'CULLAH.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (H. R. No. 3173) for the relief of James A. McCullah, late collector of the fifth district of Missouri, with an amendment by the Senate.

The amendment of the Senate was to strike out, commencing in line 12, the words "by affidavits general in their character and applying to said amount in the aggregate;" in line 15 to strike out the words "the same" and insert the words "said taxes;" and in line 16 to strike out the words "it was" and insert "they were;" so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That such credits shall not be allowed until it shall be shown to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that due diligence was used by said McCullah to make collection of said taxes while said lists remained in his hands, and that they were not collected by him; it being the intention of this act to relieve said McCullah from complying with the strict requirements of existing regulations relative to the abatement of uncollected taxes.

Mr. NIBLACK. The amendment is merely verbal in its character and immaterial. I ask that it be concurred in.

The amendment of the Senate was concurred in, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

CIRCUIT COURT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (H. R. No. 3508) conferring jurisdiction upon the criminal court of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, with amendments by the Senate.

The amendments of the Senate were read, as follows:

In line 2 strike out "concurrent."

In line 2 strike out "with the police court of said District."

At end of line 3 insert "not lawfully triable in any other court, and they are required by law to be prosecuted by indictment on information."

The amendments of the Senate were concurred in, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

LIGHT-HOUSE BOARD.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (H.R. No. 3522) to extend the jurisdiction of the Light-house Board, with an amendment by the Senate.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof:

That the Light-house Board are hereby directed to cause examinations to be made, and to report to the Secretary of the Treasury what light-houses, lights, beacons, and buoys are required for the better security of navigation on the Mississippi, Ohio, and Missouri Rivers, including specific statement as to the respective localities, where and by whom now maintained, where required, and estimated cost of their construction and maintenance.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the amendment will be concurred in.

The amendment of the Senate was concurred in, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

PORT OF DELIVERY IN ALABAMA.

The next bill on the Speaker's table was the bill (H. R. No. 899) to constitute Montgomery, in the State of Alabama, a port of delivery, with an amendment by the Senate.

The amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

Add to the bill the following proviso:
Provided, That the law constituting Selma, Alabama, a port of delivery, approved January 27, 1858, is hereby repealed; this act to take effect June 30, 1874.

Mr. SPEER. That is right.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to move non-concurrence.

Mr. SPEER. O, no; the amendment is right.

Mr. CONGER. I move non-concurrence and the appointment of a committee of conference.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the amendment may be again read.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. BROMBERG. I hope the amendment will be non-concurred in.

Mr. HAYS. I move concurrence in the amendment.

Mr. CONGER. This is a bill which was reported from the Committee on Commerce, and the Senate have amended it by repealing an act establishing Selma as a port of entry. Several gentlemen object to that.

The question being taken on suspending the rules and concurring in the Senate amendment, there were—ayes 89, noes 56.

So (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended for concurrence in the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The House having refused to concur, under a suspension of the rules, the question recurs, will the House send the bill to a committee of conference?

The question being taken, there were ayes 104, noes not counted.

So (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) a committee of conference was ordered.

CLAIMS REPORTED BY THE CLAIMS COMMISSIONERS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (H. R. No. 2797) making appropriations for the payment of claims reported allowed by the commissioners of claims, under the act of March 3, 1871, with amendment by the Senate.

The amendments of the Senate were read, as follows:

On page 47, after line 7, insert;

At the end of the bill add, as an additional section, the following:

Turpin, and the case of John Campbell, administrator of the estate of Stephen S. Springer, deceased, be, and they are hereby, referred to the commissioners of claims for re-examination and report; and the said commissioners of claims are hereby authorized to reopen, examine, and consider the said cases, and to make report thereon to Congress.

The amendments of the Senate were concurred in, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof.

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert:
That whenever any such sale under said trust shall be made, the Attorney-General of the United States may, upon the written agreement of said Jones and his sureties and the sureties of said Norton that the same may be done without discharging or in anywise affecting their respective liabilities in the premises, discharge the purchaser of any of said property under such sale from any obligation to see to the application of the purchase-money thereof.

Mr. PLATT, of New York. I move that the amendment be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

PETER S. PATTON.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 753) for the relief of Peter S. Patton.

The motion was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

HENRY S. SIBLEY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1915) to remove the political disabilities of Henry S. Sibley, a citizen of Fredericksburgh, Virginia.

The amendments of the Senate were read, as follows:

In line 2 strike out the words "or legal;" also, insert in the same line, before "Constitution," the words "fourteenth amendment of the." In line 3 strike out the words "or laws." In lines 3 and 4 strike out the words "or any amendment to said Constitution."

Mr. RAINEY. I object to that bill.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object to concurring in the Senate amendments?

Mr. RAINEY. I object to the entire bill.

Mr. HAYS. I move to suspend the rules and concur in the amendments of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

In line 13, after "lands," insert "not mineral and."
In line 20 strike out "the" and insert "or extend any."

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives be, and they are hereby, directed to adjourn their respective Houses without day on the 22d of June, 1874, at 12 o'clock noon.

Mr. DAWES. I move that this resolution be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the resolution be concurred in.

The SPEAKER. The motion to concur takes precedence of the motion to refer.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I move that the resolution be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Strictly speaking that motion is not in order. The question is on suspending the rules and concurring in the resolution.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 96, noes 72.

Mr. RANDALL called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the motion of Mr. RANDALL was not agreed to, two-thirds not voting in favor thereof.

The question being then taken on the motion of Mr. DAWES to refer the resolution to the Committee on Ways and Means, there were—ayes 132, noes 29.

So (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the resolution was referred.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not desire to influence the vote upon the question just taken; but he will now say publicly, as he has said during the day privately to several members who have addressed inquiries to him, that unless the House shall sit all through to-morrow (Sunday) it will be a simple impossibility for the adjournment sine die to take place next Monday at twelve o'clock.

Mr. DAWES. If at eleven o'clock on Monday the condition of the public business should justify it, it will then be very easy to bring in this resolution and concur in it.

Mr. MAYNARD. I do not see any need for haste in fixing the hour of adjournment. We are paid to remain here and attend to the public business.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Only half paid.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not aware of any exigency of business which would require the House to sit on Sunday for the purpose of being ready to adjourn by Monday noon.

CHIEF SIGNAL OFFICER'S REPORT.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the following concurrent resolution of the Senate; which was referred under the law to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That two thousand copies of the report of the Chief Signal Officer for 1873 be printed and bound for the use of the Secretary of War.

PRINTING OF REPORT ON TRANSPORTATION ROUTES.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the following resolution of the Senate:

and that there shall also be printed five thousand copies of said report and appendix without the evidence, of which fifteen hundred copies shall be for the use of the Senate, three thousand copies for the use of the House, and five hundred copies for the use of the Select Committee on Transportation Routes.

Mr. DONNAN. Let that lie upon the table. The House has passed a concurrent resolution, which the Senate has amended, and which will be here presently.

The SPEAKER. The resolution had better be disposed of by being referred to the committee.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Printing.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the following concurrent resolution of the Senate:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That there be printed of the report of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey for the year 1873 three thousand extra copies for the use of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey.

Mr. DONNAN. I ask that that resolution be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Printing.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PARKER] has asked to be excused from service upon the committee of conference on the Indian appropriation bill, and the Chair appoints in his place the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. SHANKS.]

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I should like to be excused also. I worked pretty hard for two days upon the committee of conference on that bill, and I prefer that some one should take my place.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I think that neither of the gentlemen should be excused. They have had this matter in charge on behalf of the Committee on Appropriations, and I think they ought to serve upon the conference committee.

REPORT ON STATISTICS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives, returned from the Senate with amendments:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed of the special report of Edward Young, Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, on the customs-tariff legislation of the United States, with appendix, including the tariff acts approved respectively May 1, 1872, and June 6, 1872, and a tabular arrangement of the rates of duty under said acts, and other statutes now in force, five thousand copies; three thousand for the House, one thousand for the Senate, and one thousand bound for the use of and distribution by the Treasury Department.

The amendments of the Senate were read and concurred in, as follows:

Strike out in lines 8, 9, and 10 the words "five thousand copies; three thousand for the House, one thousand for the Senate, and."

Insert in line 10, after the word "thousand," the word "copies."

In the same line strike out the words "and distribution by."

Mr. DONNAN. I ask that the amendments of the Senate be concurred in.

The amendments were concurred in.

The amendment of the Senate was as follows:

Strike out all after the word "printed" to the end of the resolution, and insert in lieu thereof "five thousand copies of the report of the Commissioner of Education for 1873; of which twenty-five hundred copies shall be for the use of the Commissioner, and twenty-five hundred copies shall be for sale at the cost of paper and press-work, with an addition of 10 per cent., by the Congressional Printer.

Mr. DONNAN. I ask a non-concurrence in that amendment, and that a conference committee be asked upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON TRANSPORTATION.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the following concurrent resolution of the House, returned from the Senate with an amendment:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed six thousand copies of the report, with appendix and evidence, of the Select Committee of the Senate on Transportation to the Sea-board; four thousand of which shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, and two thousand for the use of the Senate.

REPORT ON MARINE-HOSPITAL SERVICE.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the following concurrent resolution of the House, returned from the Senate with amendments:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That the Government Printer be instructed to print five thousand copies of the report of John W. Woodworth, supervising surgeon of the marine-hospital service of the United States, for the year 1873; fifteen hundred for the use of the Senate and thirty-five hundred for the use of the House of Representatives.

Mr. DONNAN. I move a concurrence in the amendments of the Senate.

The amendments were concurred in.

RAILROADS IN THE TERRITORIES.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 378) to provide for the incorporation and regulation of railroad companies in the Territories of the United States and granting to railroads the right of way through the public lands.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I move that that bill be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

LAND GRANT IN MINNESOTA.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 486) to revive and continue certain grants of lands heretofore made to the Territory and State of Minnesota to aid the construction of the several lines of the Saint Paul and Pacific Railroad Company.

The following are the provisions of the bill:

That the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1873, entitled "An act for the extension of time to the Saint Paul and Pacific Railroad Company for the completion of its roads," be, and the same is hereby, revived and extended until the 3d day of March, A. D. 1876, and no longer, upon the following conditions:

First. That all the rights of actual settlers, and their grantees, who have heretofore in good faith entered upon and actually resided on any of said lands prior to the passage of this act, or who otherwise have legal rights in any of such lands, shall be saved and secured to such settlers, or such other persons, in all respects, the same as if said lands had never been granted to aid in the construction of the said lines of railroad.

Second. That the company taking the benefit of this act shall, before acquiring any rights under it, by a certificate made and signed by its president and a majority at least of its directors, and under the seal of the corporation, accept the conditions contained in this act and file such acceptance in the Department of the Interior for record and preservation.

Mr. AVERILL. I move that this bill be put on its passage.

Mr. RANDALL. I move it be referred. I believe this is the third extension which has been asked for.

Mr. SPEER. It is the fourth.

Mr. RANDALL. It is a land grant, and was defeated here last Congress. I call for the yeas and nays on it.

Mr. AVERILL. It is not the third extension; it is the first extension. It has received the indorsement of the Committee on the Public Lands, and I hope it will pass.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is the third extension asked for this road.

Mr. DUNNELL. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement. It is an extension so that a single gap of fifty-seven miles may be completed in a road embracing six hundred and eighty-six miles.

Mr. RANDALL. It takes away the land of the Government. I object to debate.

The SPEAKER. Strictly speaking, it being necessary to pass the bill under a suspension of the rules, the motion to suspend the rules must first be seconded.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. AVERILL and Mr. RANDALL were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported that there were ayes 123, noes not counted.

So the motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the yeas and nays on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken; and there were 26 in the affirmative.

Mr. AVERILL. I ask that the other side may be counted.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. AVERILL and Mr. RANDALL were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 25, noes 147.

So (one-fifth not voting in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The rules were suspended upon a division—ayes 127, noes 31—two-thirds voting in favor thereof, and the bill was passed.

CORRECTION OF ENROLLMENT.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I ask unanimous consent to correct an error in the enrollment of the southern claims bill. It is the mere omission of the amount appropriated to the estate of John Fox, deceased. I ask that the enrolling clerk be directed to insert the amount, $7,545.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will not that require the bill to go back to the Senate?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not; it is clerical only.

There being no objection, the order was made.

CONFERENCE ON INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. STARKWEATHER, in place of Mr. LOUGHRIDGE, excused, as one of the conferees of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the Indian appropriation bill.

REGISTRATION OF DEATHS IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I am instructed by the Committee on the District of Columbia to ask that a bill be passed in reference to the registration of persons who die in Washington. There is no record now made of persons who come here and die. It is a bill to further define and enlarge the powers and duties of the board of health.

The bill provides that it shall be the duty of the board of health of the District of Columbia to make and enforce regulations to secure a full and correct record of vital statistics, including the registration of deaths and the interments of the dead in said District.

No objection being made, the bill (H. R. No. 3772) was received, read three times, and passed

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I now move that the House take a recess until eight o'clock.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I desire to say that as we are now working very well, I hope the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. GARFIELD] will allow us to go on another half hour, rather than to work after midnight, or Sunday.

Mr. GARFIELD. I must insist upon my motion to take a recess till eight o'clock.

The motion was agreed to upon a division—ayes 128, noes not counted; and accordingly (at five o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the House took a recess till eight o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at eight o'clock p. m., the Speaker in the chair.

COLLEGE HILL COMPANY.

Mr. COTTON. I have a bill to which I think there will be no objection. It is an act authorizing the incorporation of the College Hill Company for the purpose of improving certain real estate contiguous to the city of Washington for the construction of cottage, villa, and other residences.

The bill was read.

Mr. COTTON. This is to help some mechanics and to bring them under the general law, which now does not seem to embrace them.

Mr. MERRIAM. Will it allow them to issue notes?

Mr. COTTON. Of course not.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Why are these not embraced under the general law?

Mr. SPEER. I must object.

PAY TO DISCHARGED EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the clerks, messengers, folders, pages, and laborers——

Mr. RANDALL. There is no use of reading that any further; it has been already passed.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I am glad of it, but the Clerk has read the wrong resolution.

I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution (H. R. No. 115) for the relief of certain clerks and employés of the United States.

There was no objection, and the joint resolution was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution was read.

It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay, when discharged, two months' pay to such clerks and employés of the Executive Departments in Washington, District of Columbia, who shall be discharged at the close of the present fiscal year without fault on their part but by reason of the reduction made necessary by legislation at the present session of Congress; provided the amount paid under this resolution shall be deducted from the salary of any person receiving the same who shall be reappointed within six months from the date of such discharge.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REFUNDING OF DUTIES ON FRUITS.

Mr. MERRIAM. Mr. Speaker, in the early part of the session I introduced a bill to prevent the further funding of duties on fruits, and during the discussion, when the bill was before the House, I stated that $10,000 a day was being refunded. The next day a letter was received from the late Secretary of the Treasury and read in the House and thus placed upon the records. In that letter the Secretary stated there had been but $70,000 refunded altogether. That being a contradiction of the statement I had made, it is now due to me that the letter I send up to the Clerk's desk should be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, April 7, 1874.

SIR: In reply to your note of the 6th instant, requesting information as to the amount of duties refunded at New York upon imported fruit, I have to say that by returns received on Saturday last from that port, I learn for the first time that in addition to the amount refunded by the Department, there was refunded up to January 8, 1874, from the custom-house at New York, and without the same being made of record in this Department, but under the general direction that fruit is free, the additional sum of $498,164.88.

It seems that when the decision was made that fruit was free of duty, the New York custom-house commenced refunding in accordance with that decision, without a special reference to this Department, not only upon unliquidated entries, but upon entries which had been liquidated.

I am, very respectfully,

WM. A. RICHARDSON,
Secretary.

Hon. C. L. MERRIAM,
House of Representatives.

Mr. RANDALL. From the reading of that letter it appears the gentleman from New York did not state half of the truth.

Mr. ELDREDGE. That letter is as clear as mud. I hope the gentleman from New York will be permitted to explain it.

HALL FOLDING-ROOM.

Mr. COBURN. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Door-keeper of the House be authorized and directed to retain upon the rolls during the coming recess the name of the person now in charge of the Hall folding-room.

Mr. SPEER. Who is he?

Mr. COBURN. Mr. Nealy, the young man now in charge.

Mr. SPEER. Who is he, and what is the reason for the adoption of any such resolution?

Mr. COBURN. I do not pretend to know.

Mr. SPEER. If there be any particular necessity for the passage of this resolution at this time, I should like to know it.

Mr. BUFFINTON. Let it go to the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. COBURN. I do not object to that reference.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Accounts.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that the Indian appropriation bill has been sent to a conference. The list of managers on the part of the House is not complete in consequence of the declination of a member. It is important a full committee should be at once appointed so the conference may go to work.

The SPEAKER. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Connecticut declines to serve on the conference on the Indian appropriation bill?

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I do.

REORGANIZATION OF THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. KELLOGG. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution, which I do after consultation with the Secretary of the Treasury, and it is in reference to the bill for the reorganization of the Treasury and other Departments. It will cost nothing, and the Secretary wants it done.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the sub-Committee on Reform in the Civil Service have leave to sit during the vacation for the purpose of completing bills for the reorganization of the Treasury and other Departments.

Mr. SPEER. I object peremptorily to that resolution.

Mr. KELLOGG. The gentleman cannot prevent my coming here at my own expense.

Mr. SPEER. Well, you can come at your own expense, but I object to the resolution.

INSANE CONVICTS.

The SPEAKER. On the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 3415) to provide for the care and custody of persons convicted in the courts of the United States who are or may become insane while imprisoned a conference has been ordered, and the Chair appoints as managers of said conference on the part of the House Mr. MACDOUGALL, Mr. RICE, and Mr. SPEER.

JOHN D. YOUNG.

Mr. BECK. On behalf of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] who is now absent, I ask consent to introduce and have passed a bill for the relief of John D. Young, of Kentucky.

The bill was read. It appropriates $1,009 to pay to John D. Young, the difference between $2,509, ordered to be paid him by resolution of the House of February 15, 1869, and $1,500 which was paid him by order of the Committee on Accounts on the 15th of April, 1869.

Mr. SPEER. This is simply to give Mr. Young his salary as a member.

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] had intended to introduce the bill, but he is now absent.

There being no objection the bill (H. R. No. 3773) was read three times, and passed.

APPOINTMENT OF CONFERENCE COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. CONGER, Mr. BROMBERG, and Mr. RAPIER as conferees on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill (H. R. No. 899) to constitute Montgomery, in the State of Alabama, a port of delivery.

The SPEAKER also announced the appointment of Mr. DONNAN, Mr. MONROE, and Mr. HUNTON as conferees on the part of the House upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the concurrent resolution in regard to printing the report of the Commissioner of Education.

DISBURSEMENT OF MONEYS UPON PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. STRAIT. I ask unanimous consent to take up and pass a bill which has been reported from the Committee on the Public Lands—the bill (H. R. No. 3598) defining the compensation to be allowed for the disbursement of moneys expended in the construction of public buildings.

The bill was read. It provides that the provisions contained in the act approved March 3, 1869, entitled "An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1869, and for other purposes," limiting the compensation to be allowed for the disbursement of moneys appropriated for the construction of any public building was intended and shall be deemed and held to limit the compensation to be allowed to any disbursing officer who disburses moneys appropriated for and expended in the construction of any public building as aforesaid, to ½ of 1 per cent. for said services.

Mr. SPEER. I desire to ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STRAIT] whether the limitation fixed in this bill is above or below that now fixed by law?

Mr. STRAIT. It fixes the same amonnt now intended to be allowed by law; but under a construction adopted by the Department a different rule has been established.

Mr. SPEER. Then the passage of the bill will save money to the Government?

Mr. STRAIT. As I understand, it will.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to say a word about this proposition.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish the gentleman would withdraw his objection till I have made a statement.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I am opposed to the bill and I understand the gentleman is.

Mr. RANDALL. I am, but I want to show that the Treasury Department is improperly appointing officers who go all over the country receiving a percentage on the money expended upon public buildings.

Mr. ELDREDGE. That is the reason I object to the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. But I wanted to make that statement.

INTERNATIONAL STATISTICAL CONGRESS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting the official report of the delegates selected to represent the United States Government at the international statistical congress held at Saint Petersburg in August, 1872; which, with the accompanying documents, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

EXPLORATION OF COLORADO RIVER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, transmitting the report of Professor J. W. Powell on the exploration of the Colorado River and its tributaries; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

R. M. AND S. A. DOUGLAS.

The House resumed the consideration of business on the Speaker's table, the next bill being the bill (S. No. 669) referring the petition and papers in the case of Robert M. and Stephen A. Douglas, in so far as the same relates to cotton seized, to the Court of Claims.

The bill was read. It provides that the claim of Robert M. and Stephen A. Douglas, for payment for their cotton seized in March, 1863, be referred to the Court of Claims for its decision, according to law and the practice of that court in such cases and proceedings.

Mr. KELLOGG. I move that the rules be suspended and this bill passed.

Mr. HOLMAN. This measure is now before the Committee on War Claims of this House. The chairman of the committee [Mr. LAWRENCE] can perhaps inform the House whether the committee has reached a decision upon it.

Mr. LAWRENCE. It is a claim that we ought not to pass. Only two members of the committee have examined it.

Mr. RANDALL. Is there any report in the case?

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand not. The sub-committee has never been able to report upon it.

Mr. KELLOGG. I ask that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] have leave to make a statement, and then I would like to follow him, occupying one minute.

Several members objected to debate.

The question being taken on seconding the motion to suspend the rules, there were—ayes 101, noes 28; no quorum voting.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for tellers. This is a very extraordinary proposition.

Mr. RANDALL. Is there any report?

Mr. HOLMAN. No, sir; the Committee on War Claims has never completed the examination of the case.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. KELLOGG and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 118, noes 32.

So the motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

Several members called for a division.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is so extraordinary a bill to pass that I must call for the yeas and nays.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, there were—ayes 17, noes 96.

So (the affirmative being less than one-fifth of the whole vote) the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The SPEAKER. A division having been called for it is the province of the Chair to order tellers, and the gentlemen who acted as tellers before will please act again.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 109, noes 40.

So (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate still further insisted upon its amendments, disagreed to by the House, to the bill (H. R. No. 2343) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes; and insisted upon its disagreement to the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate, and had agreed to the conference asked by the House upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SARGENT, Mr. BUCKINGHAM, and Mr. GORDON the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the House of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 1620) for the relief of John L. J. Jones, of Montgomery County, Maryland, for rent and damages sustained by the destruction of a dwelling-house by accidental fire while the same was being occupied by United States troops for quarters; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3163) authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver certain condemned ordnance to the municipal authorities of Lexington, Massachusetts, for monumental purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed and requested the concurrence of the House in a bill of the following title:

A bill (S. No. 368) to provide for the establishment of an international commission of maritime powers to lay down ocean courses for steam-vessels, and otherwise provide for increased safety of sea travel.

GERMAN EVANGELICAL CHURCH AT MARTINSBURGH, WEST VIRGINIA.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 709) for the relief of the trustees of the German Evangelical church, of Martinsburgh, West Virginia.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. LAMISON. I move that the House adjourn.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, there were—ayes 61, noes 92.

Mr. RANDALL called for the yeas and nays.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, there were ayes 19.

So (the affirmative not being one-fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were not ordered; and the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair directed the Clerk to cease reading until the House should come to order. The Chair does not believe that more than a few members understand the business that is being transacted.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. Would it be in order to move that the House take a recess for half an hour?

The SPEAKER. It would.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I make that motion.

The motion was not agreed to.

Several members called for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order will proceed when gentlemen are in order, and not before. If there are any scandals connected with the closing legislation of this session, the Chair gives notice that they shall not be laid at his door.

Mr. SPEER. May I be permitted to inquire of the Chair whose duty it is to enforce order?

The SPEAKER. It is the duty of the Chair; and he has requested members to be in order. But he cannot physically control them. He can only bring the House to order by invoking the rules of the House. [After a pause.] The Clerk will read the pending bill.

The bill was read.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. As I understand, that bill has not been considered by any committee of the House. I think it ought not to pass without being considered by a committee.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I move that it be referred to the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. HAGANS. I object to its being referred.

The question being taken on referring the bill to the Committee on War Claims; the rules were suspended (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) and the bill was so referred.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE ON DISTRICT SECURITIES.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I am directed by the Joint Select Committee on Investigation into the Affairs of the District of Columbia to present a report on the subject of the President's message, referred to that committee this afternoon.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The Joint Committee on the Affairs of the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the message of the President relative to one feature of the bill entitled "An act for the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," report:

That the investigation made by this committee discloses the fact that much of the indebtedness proposed to be funded into the bonds provided for was created when there was no adequate provision for payment, and upon a basis of credit, the contractors understanding at the time that they were to receive evidences of indebtedness, the time of payment of which was uncertain, by reason whereof these evidences were depreciated in value. And while there were no means whereby the committee could determine the matter with absolute certainty, after giving the subject careful consideration they believe that a bond of the character provided for would be as a rule fully equal in value to what the contractors expected to receive under their contracts. Besides this, the funding proposed is permissive, and not compulsory. The creditors have all the security they had when the debt was created, and in addition the option to accept the bonds provided for. No injustice, therefore, will be done to any creditor who shall take such bonds in lieu of the securities he now holds. The idea that there is anything like repudiation in the bill is a mistake. The bill does not compel any holder of District securities to take bonds for them. It merely gives him the option to do so or to retain them and receive payment thereon when the District may be able to pay. The changes made in regard to the District government do not discharge or impair its contracts or liabilities. The bill, therefore, is not repudiation, nor is it unjust to any holder of District securities which may be funded under it. As to small creditors, such as laborers, &c., the bill contemplates their payment in money.

For the reasons above given, and also because it would be unwise in the opinion of your committee to set an example of issuing fifty-year bonds bearing a higher rate of interest than 3.65, they fixed that rate in the bill; and their opinion remains unchanged. That there may be no misapprehension as to the pledge of the United States, we here repeat it in the exact words of the bill: "And the faith of the United States is hereby pledged that the United States will, by proper proportional appropriations, as contemplated in their act, and by causing to be levied upon the property within said District such taxes as will do so, provide the revenues necessary to pay the interest on said bonds as the same may become due and payable, and create a sinking fund for the payment of the principal thereof at maturity." Your committee ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the message.

WILLIAM B. ALLISON.
A. G. THURMAN.
WM. M. STEWART.
J. M. WILSON.
LYMAN K. BASS.
ROBERT HAMILTON.
JAY A. HUBBELL.
HUGH J. JEWETT.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I am directed by the committee to state to the House that after this message was referred to the committee a sub-committee was sent by the committee to confer with the President in regard to this matter. The President has acted under a misapprehension in regard to the facts in this case. There is no difference of opinion between the President and the committee upon this subject.

Mr. DAWES. I rise to a question of order. I have no doubt the communication the gentleman is about to make would be very interesting, but I submit as a point of order that it is unparliamentary.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the point of order that the communication now being made to the House by the gentleman from Indiana is improper. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. Then I withdraw what I have said. I move that the report be printed, and that it do lie upon the table, and that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of subject.

The motion was agreed to.

COMPULSORY PILOT FEES.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 365) to relieve ships and vessels from compulsory pilot fees in certain cases.

The Clerk commenced the reading of the bill.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BECK. I move again that the House adjourn. The reason I assign for making that motion is that the republican side of the House is so noisy that we cannot transact business.

Mr. CONGER. I ask that the words of the gentleman from Kentucky be taken down, because they reflect upon his fellow-members.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that what the gentleman from Kentucky has said is a very obvious truth. The Chair could not direct the words to be taken down as stating anything other than the truth.

Mr. BECK. I will withdraw the motion if there is any chance of the House coming to order.

Mr. COX. I rise to a point of order. I believe the bill in relation to pilot fees is before the House.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will keep his seat the Chair will endeavor to bring the bill before the House.

Mr. COX. The Chair is very unkind and unparliamentary to a man who is endeavoring to secure proper action on the part of the House.

The bill was read.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Commerce. The chairman of the committee, the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WHEELER,] would have made the motion if he were present. I know that he intended to make it if the bill had come up this afternoon.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The House has passed this bill in terms, and this is a Senate bill containing the same provisions that the House has already passed.

Mr. COX. I object to debate.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. We ought to relieve our commerce from all these restrictions.

The question was put upon suspending the rules and passing the bill, and (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof) the bill was not passed.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I now insist on my motion.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I understood that when a bill came up and was not passed, it retained its place upon the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The motion to refer the bill is in order.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. E. R. HOAR, and it was agreed to, and the bill was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

POTTAWATOMIE INDIANS.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 218) to enable the Secretary of the Interior to make final settlement with the Pottawatomie Indians of Michigan and Indiana under treaty stipulations existing with them.

Mr. RAINEY. I move to suspend the rules so as to refer that bill to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the motion was agreed to, and the bill was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

CIVIL-RIGHTS BILL.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 1) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to protect all citizens of the United States in their civil rights, and to furnish the means for their vindication," passed April 9, 1866.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move that that bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. POLAND. I move that the rules be suspended and the bill passed.

Mr. ELDREDGE. The bill ought to go to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I withdraw my motion to refer it.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I renew the motion.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. I hope the House will pass the bill without referring it.

The question was upon suspending the rules and passing the bill.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Upon that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SPEER. Let the bill be read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I move that the further reading of the bill be dispensed with; everybody knows the contents of the civi-rights bill.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Is it not in order for me to move to suspend the rules and dispense with the further reading of the bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that that motion is in order.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I would like to know why.

Mr. CESSNA. The motion is to suspend the rules so as to pass the bill, and two motions to suspend the rules cannot be pending at the same time.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Does the Chair decide that it is not in order to suspend the rules so as to dispense with the reading?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it better that the bill should be read.

Mr. ELDREDGE. It may be better in the opinion of the Chair, but if I have a right to make that motion I desire to make it.

Mr. SENER. There is already one motion pending to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman might possibly be in order, but the Chair directs the bill to be read.

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the bill.

The question was on seconding the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 76, nays 165, not voting 48; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Archer, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Barnum, Beck, Bell, Berry, Bland, Blount, Bowen, Bright, Bromberg, Brown, Buckner, Roderick R. Butler, Caldwell, John B. So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. STOWELL said: I have been requested to state that Mr. PACKER, Mr. TYNER, and Mr. MARSHALL are absent from the Hall on a conference on the post-office appropriation bill.

The question recurred upon the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill, upon which the yeas and nays had been ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 139, nays 91, not voting 59; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Barry, Bass, Begole, Biery, Bradley, Buffinton, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Thomas, Thornburgh, Vance, Wells, Whitehead, Whitehouse, Whitthorne, Willie, Ephraim K. Wilson, Wolfe, John D. Young, and Pierce M. B. Young—91.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Cannon, Freeman Clarke, Clayton, Clements, Clinton L. Cobb, Crocker, Danford, De Witt, Duell, Eden, Elliott, Farwell, Fort, Freeman, Glover, Hagans, Eugene Hale, Harmer, Havens, Hersey, Hynes, Jewett, Killinger, Lamison, Lansing, Lofland, Marshall, Martin, Maynard, Alexander S. McDill, MacDougall, McNulta, Mitchell, Myers, Nunn, Packer, Hosea W. Parker, Isaac C. Parker, Phillips, James H. Platt, jr., Potter, Pratt, William R. Roberts, Isaac W. Scudder, Sessions, Sherwood, Lazarus D. Shoemaker, Sloan, Smart, William A. Smith, Sprague, Stephens, Strait, Taylor, Charles R. Thomas, Tyner, Waddell, Wheeler, and Wood—59.

So (two-thirds not voting in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

During the call of the roll the following announcements were made:

Mr. PARKER, of New Hampshire. On this question I am paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. CROCKER; if present he would vote "ay" and I would vote "no."

Mr. KNAPP. My colleague, Mr. MARSHALL, is absent on the committee of conference on the post-office appropriation bill; if present he would vote "no."

Mr. SHERWOOD. On this question I am paired with my colleague, Mr. JEWETT; if present he would vote "no" and I would vote "ay."

Mr. STRAIT. I am paired on this question with the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. HAVENS.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. My colleague, Mr. MARTIN, is absent on account of sickness.

Mr. MERRIAM. My colleague, Mr. WILBER, is absent on account of sickness.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. My colleague, Mr. PHILLIPS, is indisposed this evening; if present he would vote "ay."

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. On this question I am paired with the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. WADDELL.

Mr. MACDOUGAL. On this question my colleague, Mr. SMART, and myself are paired with our colleague, Mr. POTTER; if present he would vote "no" and we would vote "ay."

Mr. SPRAGUE. I am paired on this question with my colleague, Mr. LAMISON; if present he would vote "no" and I would vote "ay."

Mr. STOWELL. I am requested to state that Mr. PACKARD, Mr. TYNER, and Mr. MARSHALL are engaged on the committee of conference on the post-office appropriation bill.

Mr. COMINGO. My colleague, Mr. GLOVER, is necessarily absent; if here he would vote "no."

Mr. WHITELEY. My colleague, Mr. FREEMAN, is absent by leave of the House; if present he would vote "ay."

Mr. FORT. On this question I am paired with my colleague, Mr. EDEN.

Mr. DANFORD. I am paired on this question with the gentleman from New York, Mr. DEWITT.

The question recurred on the motion of Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I withdraw that motion. Let the bill remain on the table.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I renew the motion.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I wish to inquire, Mr. Speaker, in what position the call of committees stands.

The SPEAKER. The last committee called was the Committee on Mississippi Levees.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The Judiciary Committee is the seventeenth on the list, and will probably not be called at all during next session. Therefore to send the civil-rights bill to that committee buries it.

Mr. ELDREDGE. It is buried any way; it has been buried half a dozen times beyond the power of resurrection. It is the deadest corpse you ever saw; and you are all glad of it.

Mr. CESSNA. Mr. Speaker, what position will the bill occupy at the next session as to priority on the Speaker's table if it remains where it is?

The SPEAKER. It might be reached by a motion to go to business on the Speaker's table made at any time after the morning hour.

Mr. CESSNA. Is it not among the very first bills on the Speaker's table?

The SPEAKER. It will, of course, be among the first on the table at the next session. The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDREDGE] that the rules be suspended and the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The bill remains on the Speaker's table.

ENROLLMENT OF A BILL.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I desire to submit a concurrent resolution for correcting the enrollment of a bill.

The SPEAKER. This is to correct the same error to which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] called attention this afternoon. It has been found that the error was made in enrolling a Senate amendment, and therefore a concurrent resolution is necessary.

There being no objection the resolution was read, considered, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That the Clerk of the House be authorized in enrolling the seventh Senate amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 2797) making appropriations for the payment of claims reported allowed by the commissioners of claims under the act of Congress of March 3, 1871, to insert the words "7,545," being the sum awarded to the party named in said amendment; said sum having been omitted from the Senate amendment as engrossed and sent to the House of Representatives.

TEXAS AND PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 732) supplementary to the act entitled "An act to incorporate the Texas Pacific Railroad Company, and to aid in the construction of its road, and for other purposes."

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Texas and Pacific Railway Company is hereby empowered to secure, by one or more mortgages upon the whole or any portion of its line, the construction bonds heretofore authorized to be issued, and to cancel the mortgage now on record with the Secretary of the Interior so far as the same can be done without prejudice to existing rights, and to substitute therefor the mortgage or mortgages hereby authorized, which substituted mortgages shall expressly reserve all rights which may have been acquired under the existing mortgage: Provided, That the aggregate of the said bonds to be issued under and secured by said mortgage or mortgages shall not exceed the limit heretofore fixed by Congress; and said mortgages for the division east of Fort Worth shall embrace the roads and property of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company and of the Southern Transcontinental Railway Company, heretofore merged in and consolidated with the said Texas and Pacific Railway Company under the authority and requirements of the laws of the State of Texas; and which roads so merged as aforesaid shall for that and all other purposes be deemed and taken to be a part of the said Texas and Pacific Railway, and shall hereafter be subject to all the provisions and limitations of the act of Congress incorporating said company and of the supplements thereto: And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed or have the effect to entitle said corporation to any other or further rights to public lands or in any other respect as against the United States than such as by law it is now entitled to.

Mr. HOUGHTON. I move that the rules be suspended and this bill be passed. It has been considered by the Committee on the Pacific Railroad; and I am authorized by that committee to recommend its passage.

Mr. SPEER. I hope that the gentleman from California [Mr. HOUGHTON] will be allowed to explain to the House the effect of this bill. The bill is right. It is only necessary that the House should understand its provisions in order to secure its passage.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand it to be a consolidation of railroad interests.

Mr. SPEER. The bill grants no subsidy; it gives no lands; it merely allows several mortgages to be taken where under the existing law only one mortgage can be taken. That is the practical effect of it. It does not injure the Government to the extent of a penny, but it in express terms protects all existing rights.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. HOUGHTON, there were—ayes 103, noes 44.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to call the yeas and nays on this question, though I hardly expect to obtain them against a railroad corporation.

Mr. SPEER. That is an unjust insinuation against an honest bill.

Mr. STORM. Then why does not the gentleman help us to get the yeas and nays?

Mr. SPEER. I will do so with pleasure.

The yeas and nays were not ordered; there being ayes 12, noes not counted.

So (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

CONTRACTORS FOR WAR VESSELS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 141) for the relief of certain contractors for the construction of vessels of war and machinery.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the claims for building vessels of war and constructing steam-machinery, referred to and embraced in the act entitled "An act for the relief of certain contractors for the construction of vessels of war and steam-machinery," approved March 2, 1867, be, and the same are hereby, referred to the Court of Claims, which is hereby vested with authority and jurisdiction to hear and determine the respective claims of the several parties: Provided, however, That the investigation of said claims shall be upon the following basis: The said court shall ascertain the additional cost which was necessarily incurred by said contractors for the building of said vessels of war and in the construction of steam-machinery, in the completion of the same by reason of any changes or alterations in the plans and specifications required, and delays in the prosecution of the work, which were not provided for in the original contract; but no allowance for any advance in the price of labor or material shall be considered unless such advance occurred during the prolonged term for completing the work rendered necessary by the delay resulting from the action of the Government, and then only when such advance could not have been avoided by the exercise of ordinary prudence and diligence on the part of the contractors: And provided further, That the compensation fixed by the contracts between the contractors and the Government for specific alterations shall be conclusive as to the compensation to be made therefor: And provided further, That all moneys paid to said contractors by the Government over and above the original contract price for the building of said vessels and the construction of said machinery shall be deducted from any amounts allowed by said court by reason of the matters hereinbefore stated; and if the amounts so to be deducted in any case shall exceed the amount allowed by said court, judgment shall be entered for the excess against such claimant in favor of the United States; and said court is directed to certify such judgment and record to the circuit court of the circuit where such claimant resides, and said circuit court is hereby vested with authority to issue execution and to enforce its collection the same as if said judgment had originally been rendered therein: And provided further, That if any of such changes caused less work and expense to the contractors than the original plans and specifications, a corresponding reduction shall be made from the contract price, and the amount thereof be deducted from any allowance to be made by said court to said claimants: And provided further, That all claims under the provisions of this act shall be presented within one year from the passage thereof and not afterward; and the claimants in their petitions shall stipulate and agree to accept and abide by all the provisions of this act.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I move that the rules be suspended and that this bill be passed. A corresponding bill of the House has already been approved by the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. KELLOGG. The bill has been acted upon favorably by the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. LAWRENCE. It has never been acted on by the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. A corresponding bill has been.

Mr. LAWRENCE. This bill involves a great deal more.

Mr. ARCHER. It involves $7,000,000.

Mr. NEGLEY. It does not involve $7,000,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. May not the reading of a report be required upon a motion to suspend the rules and pass a bill?

The SPEAKER. The motion is to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move the rules be suspended and the report read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Wisconsin because he reported a bill somewhat similar in title from the Committee on War Claims, which bill is now before the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. ARCHER. It is not the same bill which is in the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. RANDALL. I should like to know whether it is not in order to suspend the rules for the report to be read. These reports are prepared for the information of the House.

The SPEAKER. That motion will not be in order any more than a motion to suspend the rules and allow a member to speak for an hour. Besides, there is already one motion to suspend the rules pending. The motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HAZELTON] is the motion in order under the order by which the House has proceeded to the consideration of the business upon the Speaker's table. Is there a second to the motion to suspend the rules?

Mr. HAZELTON of Wisconsin, and Mr. HOLMAN, were appointed tellers.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 95, noes 51.

So the motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

Mr. RANDALL demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the bill be again read.

The bill was again read.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 115, nays 109, not voting 65; as follows:

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GARFIELD. I submit the following conference report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3030) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1873, and 1874, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from their amendments numbered 5, 10, 11, 12.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 3, 4, 8, 13, 17, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 28, 31, 35, 36, 37, 44.

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the House to the amendment numbered 42, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 18, and agree to the same, as follows, namely: Substitute for the words stricken out the following:

Provided, That none of the moneys hereby appropriated for the payment of deficiencies in the Indian service shall be paid until the necessity for the expenditures shall have been examined into by the Secretary of the Interior and any existing board of peace commissioners.

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from their amendment numbered 30, with an amendment as follows: Add after the word "Congress" at the close of the paragraph these words: "And the unexpended balance of the appropriation for wrapping-paper provided for in the act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1874, is hereby made available for the purchase of wrapping-paper and twine;" and the House agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 40, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out all of the said amendment after the word "the" in line 2 of said amendment, and insert the following: "Remainder of the Forty-third Congress not already paid for, $42,364, in lieu of all compensation otherwise provided for;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their amendment to the amendment of the Senate numbered 41, and the Senate recede from their amendment, and agree to the following as a substitute for the original paragraph, namely:

To pay the five Official Reporters of the proceedings and debates of the House for the remainder of the Forty-third Congress, $24,815; and hereafter the pay of the Official Reporters of the proceedings and debates of each House shall be $50,000, and the pay of official reporters of committees of the House shall be $5,000 each per annum, and this shall be in lieu of all other compensation for such services in reporting the proceedings of each and all of said committees.

And the House agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the amendment numbered 43, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Insert after the word "erection" in line 4, page 30 of the bill, the words "and furnishing;" and insert after the word "building," in same line and page, the words "and grounds;" and insert after the word "money," line 9, same page, the words "or any part thereof;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 9, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Add after the word "dollars," in said amendment, the following:

For Army pensions and expenses thereof under the various acts of Congress, $300,000; and there is hereby appropriated a sum sufficient to make the compensation of the clerk of the House Committee on Invalid Pensions equal to $2,160 per annum for the Forty-Third Congress, and no longer.

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the amendment numbered 14, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the word "five" from said amendment and insert in lieu thereof the word "three," and after the word "hundred" in line 21, page 17 of the bill, insert the words "and fifty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

JAMES A. GARFIELD,
EUGENE HALE,
Managers on the part of the House.
A. A. SARGENT,
LOT M. MORRILL,
JAMES K. KELLY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. GARFIELD. If any gentleman desires to put any questions in regard to this conference report I shall be happy to answer them.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will explain the new features which are incorporated into this bill by the conference committee. And I wish to ask him to what extent the committee have increased the compensation of the reporters of the Senate. I observe from the reading of the report that the pay of the reporters of committees and the reporters of the debates of the House is put at $5,000. What is the increase in the compensation of the Senate reporters?

Mr. GARFIELD. No new matter has been introduced into this report except two subjects that were referred to the conference committee by the House itself. One was a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, informing the House that there would be a deficiency of $300,000 in the appropriation for Army pensions. That has been incorporated into this bill. There has also been referred to us a resolution of the House in regard to the clerk of the Committee on Pensions, a cognate subject.

In answer to the question of the gentleman from Indiana, I will state that the House, it will be remembered, by a very decided majority raised the pay of the reporters of the debates of the House to $5,000 each, instead of a salary of $4,200 as provided earlier in the session. The only change that has been made in that regard is that the managers of the conference on the part of the Senate insisted that the Senate reporters should have equal payment with ours. Although it was admitted that we had more columns of actual report during the session—during this session at least—than the Senate, yet it was suggested that the Senate had an extra executive session after the House adjourns, sometimes lasting a month. They furthermore insisted, and it is true, that there are far more speeches in the House merely printed, not actually delivered, than there are in the Senate, and hence that their reporters had more actual reporting of the proceedings in proportion to the number of pages covered than the reporters of the House. On this ground it seemed to us reasonable that the same amount should be paid to the Senate reporters as to ours. We therefore concur in the amendment with regard to the Senate reporters, with an amendment allowing to the Senate reporters the same pay as to the reporters of the House.

If there is any question which any gentleman desires to ask in relation to any other matter, I shall be glad to answer it. I may remark that there were forty-four amendments in difference between the two Houses. On four the Senate receded absolutely; on sixteen the House receded absolutely; and on the remaining twenty-four there were meetings by mutual concession on the part of the two Houses.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio what has been done with regard to the deficiency for the Indian service?

Mr. GARFIELD. In regard to that we found the same difficulty that was met to-day in connection with the Indian appropriation bill, and we exactly split the difference after a very long contest.

Mr. STARKWEATHER. How much increase is it over the House appropriation?

Mr. GARFIELD. The amount in the report is $150,000 less than the Senate had insisted on, and $150,000 more than the House originally adopted. We exactly divided the difference between the two Houses on that subject.

Mr. HOLMAN. The deficiency alluded to by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations as having been referred to the committee of conference, and which was reported to the House from the Pension Bureau, is I believe an entirely new feature in our legislative history. I hope, inasmuch as there is no objection at all, I presume, to that feature of the report of the conference committee being adopted, that the fact shall appear upon the record that it was done by unanimous consent. But I do insist that as a question of parliamentary law the subject could not properly be referred to that committee. But this proposition having been referred to the committee of conference without objection, and coming from it without objection, it will establish no precedent.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think this is a very important matter, and I should be glad to hear from the Chair if there is any precedent for one House referring a new matter to a committee of conference that is not one of the subjects in dispute between the two Houses. In this case it has worked very well. It was vitally important that this matter should come before the committee of conference, for it was discovered that a deficiency was likely to arise in the amount necessary to pay the pensions of Army pensioners for this year. The gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] although he does not wish to make any point in this case, raises the question as to what is the parliamentary rule, and I should be glad to know of the Speaker whether u der the rules there is anything unusual or out of order in one House referring a new matter to a conference committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to submit a remark upon this subject. This report really comes in by unanimous consent, because the new matter which has been referred to the committee of conference was referred to the committee by unanimous consent and is reported by unanimous consent; but the proposition I desire to submit is this, that there is certainly no precedent for such action on the part of one House of Congress, and it should appear rather as being by the unanimous action of the House than as the result of a decision of the Chair that such a proceeding is in order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana will remember that the Chair did not rule that without unanimous consent a new matter could be referred to a committee of conference after it had been appointed. On that ground the Chair would have been bound to rule it out.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am very glad to hear that decision from the Chair.

The SPEAKER. It was only on account of the extraordinary exigency of the case that this matter was admitted and referred by unanimous consent.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will state that this report is the unanimous report of the committee of conference; but the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. SWANN,] one of the conferees, is absent this evening, and we were unable to obtain his signature to the report. I now call for a vote.

The question was taken, and the report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the report of the committee of conference was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3030) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1873 and 1874, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, the bill of the House No. 2801 to place on the retired list of the Navy M. H. Plunkett, late second assistant engineer of the regular Navy.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the House will not adjourn. We should get two more conference committees appointed before we adjourn. I will state that the Senate has now concluded its work upon the sundry civil appropriation bill. We want to get it here so that it may be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and then we can adjourn until early on Monday morning. I believe that the committee of conference on the Indian appropriation bill are very nearly ready to report.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to move that the House take a recess for fifteen minutes, but I will yield to the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. RANSIER.]

CUBAN PATRIOTS.

Mr. RANSIER. I ask unanimous consent to offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. If that requires unanimous consent I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina desires that his resolution shall be read.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I object.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object to the reading?

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Yes, sir; I object.

Mr. RANSIER. I trust that the gentleman will as a matter of courtesy withdraw his objection, and allow the resolution to be read.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. Very well, sir; I withdraw it.

The Clerk read the resolution proposed by Mr. RANSIER, as follows:

Resolved, That the patriots in Cuba, for their constancy and courage manifested in a struggle of nearly six years' duration to accomplish the abolition of slavery and the slave trade, and to establish the just equality of all men in the enjoyment of civil and political rights, as well as for their unwavering devotion to the spirit and form of a republican government, and their heroic sacrifice of life and property in the maintenance of the same, are entitled to the unqualified sympathy of the friends of free government throughout the world.

Mr. GARFIELD. I object to the resolution.

Mr. RANSIER. I move that the rules be suspended and the resolution passed.

The SPEAKER. The rules cannot be suspended, because the House is now acting under a suspension of the rules.

Mr. RANSIER. Then I ask the privilege of having the resolution printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Several members objected.

SAINT CROIX RAILROAD.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 655) to extend the time for the completion of a railroad from the Saint Croix River or Lake between townships 25 and 31, to the west end of Lake Superior, and to Bayfield in the State of Wisconsin.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House now take a recess for fifteen minutes. It is reported that the Senate have concluded their consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill and it will be over here in a few minutes.

The motion for a recess was not agreed to; upon a division—ayes 33, noes not counted.

The House resumed the consideration of Senate bill No. 654.

Mr. SAWYER. I will yield to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. BRADLEY,] who is a member of the Committee on the Public Lands, and who desires to move a substitute for this bill.

Mr. RANDALL. This is the celebrated Proctor Knott Du Luth bill.

Mr. BRADLEY. I move that this bill be passed with a substitute which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the time for the completion of the railroad from the Saint Croix River or Lake between townships 25 and 31, to the west end of Lake Superior, and to Bayfield in the State of Wisconsin, is hereby extended five years from the passage of this act, and that the act of Congress of June 3, 1856, and the act of May 5, 1864, enlarging the same to aid said State in the construction of said railroad, be, and the same is hereby, continued in full force to said State until the expiration of the said five years: Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to any lands that have been sold, entered under the homestead act, or upon which pre-emption rights have attached subsequent to May 5, 1864: Provided further, That no benefit shall be received under this act until the company or companies entitled to the same shall file an acceptance in writing with the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to amend by striking out "five years" and inserting "fifty years," so as to save the time of Congress in extending this grant.

Mr. SAWYER. It is not necessary to do that; I think we can get along with five years.

Mr. BRADLEY. I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill with the substitute which has been read.

Mr. O'BRIEN. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio. I rise to a parliamentary question. Do we not have to take a vote on the substitute before we vote on the passage of the bill?

The SPEAKER. The motion is to suspend the rules and pass the bill as proposed to be amended

Mr. RANDALL. What became of my amendment to make it fifty years?

The SPEAKER. That was not in order.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 92, nays 95, not voting 102; as follows:

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. WOODFORD asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD, as a portion of the debates of this House, some remarks he had prepared upon the report of the committee of conference on the currency bill this day adopted by the House. (See Appendix.)

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the report of the second committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 2343) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHANKS. I rise to a privileged report from the second conference committee on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the Indian appropriation bill. I will state that the only change that we have made in the report of the former committee of conference is in relation to the forty-sixth and forty-seventh amendments of the Senate concerning the Apache Indians. I would suggest that in order to save time only that portion of the report need now be read.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection that will be done.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the House recede from their disagreement to the amendment numbered 46 and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the sum proposed to be inserted by said Senate amendment insert the sum of $375,000.

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the amendment numbered 47, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows:

Strike out the word "fifty," and insert in lieu thereof the word "twenty-five."

And the Senate agree to the same.

The report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DAWES. I move, Mr. Speaker, that the House take a recess from now until half-past ten o'clock on Monday morning. I am informed it will be some hours before the sundry civil appropriation reaches the House from the Senate, and that an arrangement will then be made by which it can be informally submitted to the Committee on Appropriations as if done by a vote of the House, so that everything will be accomplished that could be by our remaining here.

MAIL CONTRACTS.

Mr. PACKER, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, submitted a report in regard to mail contracts and temporary service; which was laid upon the table and ordered to be printed.

MRS. GATES.

Mr. RANDALL. Before we take a recess, Mr. Speaker, I wish to withdraw my objection to the bill for the relief of Mrs. Gates to which I objected this morning. I find I was wrong and now wish to put myself right as soon as possible.

Mr. DUNNELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania having withdrawn his objection to the bill, I now ask to have put on its passage a bill (H. R. No. 3774) for the relief of the widow and children of Colonel William Gates, United States Army.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to ascertain the value of the property lost by Colonel William Gates, of the United States Army, who was on board the steamship San Francisco in the month of December, 1853, when she was wrecked between New York and San Francisco, said property consisting of furniture, wearing apparel, &c., of his family then on board, and the amount so ascertained shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; provided that no allowance be made for any property except such as was necessary and proper for an officer of that grade ordered on such service; and further provided, that such amount as may have been received by said Gates, if any, for property lost, under the law of March 27, 1854, be deducted from whatever may be adjudged to be due him under the act previous to the payment of the same, and the sum so found due shall be paid.

Mr. DUNNELL. This is the unanimous report of the Committee on Claims.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed unanimously.

Mr. DUNNELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REMOVING OBSTRUCTIONS IN THE RED RIVER, ETC.

Mr. SMITH, of Louisiana, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3775) authorizing the Secretary of War to use certain unexpended balances of appropriations for dredging bars and removing obstructions in the Red, Ouachita, and Atchafalaya Rivers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

NEW STATE OUT OF TEXAS AND LOUISIANA.

Mr. SMITH, of Louisiana, also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3776) for the erection of a new State out of certain portions of the States of Texas and Louisiana; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

And then, on motion of Mr. DAWES, (at eleven o'clock and forty minutes p. m.,) the House took a recess until Monday morning at half-past ten o'clock.

AFTER RECESS.

The recess having expired, the House (at ten o'clock and thirty minutes a. m. Monday, June 22) resumed its session.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the concurrent resolution of the House for correcting an error in the enrollment of the bill (H. R. No. 2797) making appropriations for the payment of claims reported allowed by the commissioners of claims.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 3168) making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 3600) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3256) to repeal so much of the act approved May 8, 1872, entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1873, and for other purposes," as provides for the employment of persons to assist the proper officers of the Government in discovering and collecting moneys withheld, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 2246) relating to circuit courts of the United States for the districts of Alabama; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3772) for the relief of John D. Young.

The message also announced that the Senate had receded from its amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 899) to constitute Montgomery, in the State of Alabama, a port of delivery.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. MONROE, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to print in the RECORD some remarks on the currency bill. (See Appendix.)

THOMAS H. MARSTON.

Mr. COX. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That Thomas H. Marston, door-keeper of the reporters' gallery of the House of Representatives, be continued on the rolls during the recess of Congress at the present rate of compensation, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. That cannot be done under the rules.

Mr. COX. It was done under the rules last session.

Mr. GARFIELD. It has to be done by law.

Mr. COX. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Accounts, with the right to report at any time.

The motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM TOD HELMUTH.

Mr. SCHUMAKER, of New York. I move that the Committee on the Library be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3506) for the relief William Tod Helmuth, of New York, and that the same be passed.

The bill was read. In its preamble it states that William Tod Helmuth, M. D., of the city of New York, has composed and is the author of a book entitled "A System of Surgery, by Wm. Tod Helmuth, M. D.," in the entering of the title of which book with the Librarian of Congress at Washington, on or about the 22d day of August, 1872, an imperfect copy of the title thereof was deposited, and the act relating to copyrights has been otherwise not complied with, but without any improper intent on the part of said William Tod Helmuth, M. D. The bill therefore provides that William Tod Helmuth, M. D., the author of the book entitled "A System of Surgery, by Wm. Tod Helmuth, M. D.," may, within ninety days from the passage of the act, enter an amended and corrected title of the book, and deposit two copies of said book with the Librarian of Congress at Washington, who is directed to receive the same; and that upon complying with this law, the right of said William Tod Helmuth, M. D., to his said book, and to the copyright thereof, shall be the same in all respects as though all the requirements of the copyright laws of the United States had been duly complied with when said imperfect title was first recorded with the Librarian of Congress in 1872, and when said book was first published. And it shall not be necessary for said William Tod Helmuth, M. D., to insert in the copies of such book any other or further notice of copyright thereto than would have been required had the copyright laws been originally duly complied with.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

ALEXANDER HENDERSON.

Mr. ALBERT. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (S. No. 828) for the relief of Alexander Henderson.

The bill was read. It directs the Treasurer of the United States to pay to Alexander Henderson $234.71 for balance due him as late consul at Londonderry, in Ireland.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

DR. MARY E. WALKER.

Mr. SCUDDER, of New York. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on War Claims the bill for the relief of Dr. Mary E. Walker.

The bill was read.

Mr. CRUTCHFIELD. I object.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONERS TO VIENNA EXPOSITION.

Mr. DONNAN, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Mr. DONNAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The report was concurred in.

Mr. DONNAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRINTING OF NATIONAL-BANK NOTES, ETC.

Mr. MERRIAM. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Speaker be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint a committee of three to examine into the printing of national-bank notes, cost of paper, and other materials, and the general management of the affairs in the office of the Comptroller of the Currency, said committee to report to Congress at the next session.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman intends that power shall be given to the committee to sit during the recess, the resolution, as worded, will not do that.

Mr. MERRIAM. I desire to have that power, and will modify the resolution accordingly.

Mr. HURLBUT. I object to the present consideration of the resolution.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. DARRALL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills and joint resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

CONTRACTS FOR INDIAN SUPPLIES.

Mr. AVERILL. I am directed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to report the evidence taken by that committee touching the awarding and execution of contracts for Indian supplies and transportation for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1873, and June 30, 1874. I move that the report with the accompanying documents be printed and laid on the table, and that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

Mr. ADAMS. I object to that action if I have the right.

The SPEAKER. As objection is made, the report may be printed and recommitted.

Mr. ADAMS. I object, for the reason that, as a member of the committee, I desire to make a minority report.

Mr. AVERILL. The committee was authorized to report at any time. This is a privileged report. I ask that the committee may be discharged.

Mr. ADAMS. But the resolution giving the committee authority to report at any time did not contemplate that the House should act on the subject immediately upon the making of the report. I object to the present consideration of the report.

Mr. AVERILL. I submit that the gentleman has no right to object. I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. As objection is made, the report will be printed and recommitted. This question between the gentlemen can be settled hereafter.

REORGANIZATION OF TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. KELLOGG. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the sub-committee upon the bill for reorganizing the Treasury Department have leave to sit at their own expense during the vacation for the purpose of completing the bill for the reorganization of said Department,

Mr. SPEER. I objected to a resolution of this kind on Saturday evening, but as now modified I think it is right.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I must object to the resolution unless the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KELLOGG] will strike out the words "at their own expense."

Mr. KELLOGG. I will do so.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I do not think that this House ought to charge a committee with an official duty and then compel it to pay its own expenses.

Mr. ELLIS H. ROBERTS. I object to the resolution absolutely.

MISCELLANEOUS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GARFIELD. I report back from the Committee on Appropriations the amendments of the Senate to the sundry civil appropriation bill. We have not had the time to have printed the report on the subject; and I request that the Speaker may announce as each amendment is read the recommendation of the committee.

Mr. SPEER. What is the aggregate amount which the Senate has added to this bill?

Mr. GARFIELD. The Senate has added about $4,500,000 to the bill as it left the House. Most of this increase is in two or three large amounts, which will be discussed as we reach them in order. The Committee on Appropriations of the House spent four or five hours yesterday (I am sorry to say we were compelled to sit yesterday) in going carefully over these amendments. I move that the House now proceed to consider the amendments under the five-minute rule.

The SPEAKER. There being no objection, that order will be made.

The amendments of the Senate were read, and, except in the cases noted below, were severally concurred or non-concurred in nem. con., according to the recommendations of the Committee on Appropriations.

The first amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

In the paragraph making appropriations for printing of the various Departments strike out the following:

And the amounts herein designated for the several Executive Departments may be distributed to the Bureaus thereof, at the discretion of the head of each Department, who shall certify such distribution to the Public Printer.

And insert the following:

Provided, That hereafter the Congressional Printer shall print, upon the order of the heads of the Executive Departments, respectively, only such limited number of the annual reports of such Departments and necessary accompanying reports of subordinates as may be deemed necessary for the use of Congress: Provided, however, That no expensive maps or illustrations shall be printed without the special order of Congress.

The Committee on Appropriations recommended concurrence.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like the chairman of the committee [Mr. GARFIELD] to state with whom is left the discretion to designate the number of these reports to be printed.

Mr. GARFIELD. This amendment is, we believe, in the interest of economy——

Mr. RANDALL. I know that; but who has the discretion as to the limitation of the number of the annual reports?

Mr. GARFIELD. The heads of the various Departments.

Mr. RANDALL. They will still have that discretion?

Mr. GARFIELD. This provision takes it out of the power of Bureau officers to order large numbers of these documents. I think it is right and ought to be concurred in.

The amendment was concurred in.

The fourth amendment was read, as follows:

On page 4 of the printed bill insert the following new paragraph:

For establishing new life-saving stations on the sea and lake coasts of the United States, as authorized by law of the present Congress, $342,304.44.

The Committee on Appropriations recommended concurrence.

Mr. SPEER. Will the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations please state why concurrence is recommended? I understand the reason; but I want it to appear on the record.

Mr. GARFIELD. Because a law was passed a few days ago enlarging the number of life-saving stations.

Mr. SPEER. That has become a law since this bill passed the House?

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes, sir; and this appropriation is necessary to conform to the law as it now stands.

The sixth amendment was read, as follows:

For the purchase of an engine and machinery, and for the erection and expenses incident to its operation, for the maceration of national-bank notes, United States notes, and other obligations of the United States authorized to be destroyed, $10,000; and that all such issues hereafter destroyed may be destroyed by maceration instead of burning to ashes, as now provided by law; and that so much of sections 24 and 43 of the national currency act as requires national-bank notes to be burned to ashes is hereby repealed; that the pulp from such macerated issue shall be disposed of only under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to state to the House that this is a question of cremation or maceration. I am personally of the opinion that it is cheaper to treat the mutilated notes that have to be destroyed in the manner suggested by this amendment than in any other way. It is a matter upon which I should be glad to have the judgment of the House.

Mr. MERRIAM. It is the unanimous opinion of the Committee on Banking and Currency that this is the proper mode of disposing of mutilated notes.

Mr. GARFIELD. Since the committee examined and reported upon these amendments we have found that the Committee on Banking and Currency unanimously recommended this provision, and therefore I feel authorized to change the recommendation of the committee.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. DAWES. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at ten o'clock and fifty-eight minutes a. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as stated:

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, June 22, 1874.

The Senate met at eleven o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the reading of the Journal be dispensed with, and I desire to state before the motion is put that I ask the attention of the Senate to the importance of passing at least a few clauses of the tariff and tax bill sent us by the House. I propose as soon as I can get the floor to call up that bill and ask the Senate to act only on such points in the House bill as to which there is no objection here. There are some few points in it that ought to be passed, for the benefit of the revenue, and to insure certainty in the revenue. I do not desire to act upon any matter which will give rise to debate. I am informed that if this course is pursued by the Senate we can promptly and without delay pass a few items of the bill as to internal revenue and as to customs duties which the Department are anxious and desirous we shall act upon without any prolonged debate.

Mr. RAMSEY. I entirely agree with the Senator from Ohio, and in this connection would give notice that the post-route bill is yet unacted upon. It is a long bill; the amendments are numerous and must go into the hands of the clerks to be engrossed and the whole bill to be enrolled unless you intend to lose it. If there is no objection, I ask the Senate now to act on it, concurring with the Senator from Ohio in all he has said about his bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the reading of the Journal be dispensed with with a view of taking up the tariff and tax bill. It will not take more than half an hour under this arrangement.

Mr. RAMSEY. Allow me first to pass the post-route bill so as to get it in the hands of the clerks.

Mr. SHERMAN. The tariff bill is of much more importance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to dispense with the reading of the Journal of Saturday's proceedings? The Chair hears no objection, and the reading is dispensed with.

INSANE CONVICTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 3415) to provide for the care and custody of persons convicted in the courts of the United States who have or may become insane while imprisoned, Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, Mr. WRIGHT, and Mr. STEVENSON.

EDUCATION REPORT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives non-concurring in the amendment of the Senate to the resolution of the House for printing copies of the report of the Commissioner of Education for 1873.

The amendment of the Senate was to make the resolution of the House read:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed five thousand copies of the report of the Commissioner of Education for 1873, of which twenty-five hundred copies shall be for the use of the Commissioner, and twenty-five hundred copies shall be sold at the cost of paper and press-work, with an addition of 10 per cent., by the Congressional Printer.

The House non-concurred in this amendment and asked for the appointment of a committee of conference.

Mr. ANTHONY. There is no time for a committee of conference to meet and report upon a matter of printing. I think the Senate had better settle this question now. The House passed a resolution to print twenty thousand copies of the report of the Commissioner of Education. The Senate amended the resolution by providing for printing five thousand, one-half for the Commissioner, the other half for sale at cost and 10 per cent. added. The House has non-concurred in that amendment and asks for a conference. The members of the House are very anxious to have this document printed. The number is very large, twenty thousand, and that being much more than the Senate have agreed to on any proposition, the Committee on Printing did not feel at liberty to recommend it. I would prefer to have the judgment of the Senate upon that, either to concur or non-concur.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Rhode Island make a motion?

Mr. ANTHONY. I make a motion pro forma, to bring the question before the Senate, that the Senate recede, the effect of which will be to order twenty thousand to be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator will wait until we get the post-office appropriation bill acted on, I have no doubt the matter will be settled readily; but it cannot be done now.

Mr. ANTHONY. Let it lie over, then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The matter will be laid aside.

TAX AND TARIFF BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move now to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3572) to amend existing customs and internal revenue laws, and for other purposes, giving notice that I do not intend to press any debatable matter?

Mr. SCHURZ. I would ask the Senator from Ohio whether he intends to drop those amendments that were reported by the Committee on Finance?

Mr. SHERMAN. O, no; not those to which there is no objection.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to the consideration of the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Finance with amendments.

The first amendment of the committee was in section 1, line 3, to strike out the words "date of the passage of this act" and insert 30th day of June, 1874;" so as to read:

That from and after the 30th day of June, 1874, in lieu of the duties heretofore imposed, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Do I understand the Senator from Ohio to say that anything to which there is objection is to be passed over or to be discussed?

Mr. SHERMAN. Any matter that gives rise to any considerable debate, any more than a passing comment, I propose shall be stricken out. I do not propose at this stage of the session to pass in this bill any matter on which there is a substantial difference of opinion, but to save for the revenue on this bill, which came to us so late that we cannot act on it in the usual way, such matters as give rise to no debate and no controversy.

THE POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. RAMSEY. I want to appeal to the Senator from Ohio to give way to me to pass the post-route bill. I think it will take but five minutes. Let the tariff bill be laid aside informally.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the proposition of the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SHERMAN. I expect that is the quickest way to satisfy my friend from Minnesota.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota is recognized, and the post-route bill will be taken up.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 3804) to establish certain post-routes.

Mr. DAVIS. I move to dispense with the reading of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir. No bill shall pass that is not read.

Mr. RAMSEY. I will state that there is nothing in the bill but an enumeration of the post-routes which it provides for.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I want the Senator to tell the Senate what the enumeration is, how much it amounts to, and what service it provides for. This is the second installment this session. The first was a very big one.

Mr. RAMSEY. I suppose Congress will pass the bill finally. It has done so at every session since the Government began. There are about seven hundred routes in the bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I am unwilling on that statement to allow the bill to pass.

Mr. SHERMAN. The reading of this bill being called for, I insist on the regular order.

STATUE OF ADMIRAL FARRAGUT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senate that a motion was made on Saturday to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed the joint resolution (H. R. No. 59) in regard to the statue of Admiral Farragut. A motion was made to lay the motion to reconsider on the table, and the Chair is informed that it is the universal custom of the Senate when a motion to reconsider is laid on the table to send the bill to the other House; but the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] gave notice that he would call up this motion to reconsider, and therefore, out of courtesy to him, the Secretary has withheld the resolution for the present; but unless the Senate act upon it this morning or otherwise instruct the Secretary upon it he will, under the practice, have to send the resolution to the other House.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I simply desire to occupy the time of the Senate for a few moments in discussing the propriety of this measure and showing that there is a vital amendment that ought to be proposed to it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am quite sure my friend from Vermont will not ask that, as he knows about as well as I that the tariff bill should not go over for anything of this kind now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Very well; let the regular order proceed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. We can settle this matter after a while.

TAX AND TARIFF BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is before the Senate, being the bill (H. R. No. 3572) to amend existing customs and internal-revenue laws, and for other purposes, and the reading will be continued.

The Chief Clerk continued to read the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was in section 1, line 23, after the word "over," to insert the words "in value;" so as to read "25 per cent. or over in value of cotton, flax, wool, or worsted."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be agreed to if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. If this bill is going through at that rate I want to move on the second page, line 21, after the word "ad valorem," to insert:

On vulcanized India-rubber and all manufactures of the same, not otherwise provided for 35 per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. SHERMAN. I object. That raises a very troublesome question. I hope the Senators who look to this bill now will stand by the Committee on Finance and reject all amendments except such as are generally assented to. This is a proposition to introduce the subject of vulcanized rubber, a matter that has not been considered at all by the committee of either House. If we open any question of this kind the Senator from New Jersey will see that the passage of the bill now is defeated.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. But this part of the bill does change the law and makes 60 per cent. duty on vulcanized Indian-rubber.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know that.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Then you are effecting an important change in the matter of vulcanized rubber.

Mr. SHERMAN. The law as it is now here is as it is understood in the Tresury Department and as it was acted upon, but it was reversed by an inconsiderate decision, as I think, recently, by which the revenue has suffered. This section simply returns to the law as it was understood.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The case is this: The Senator moves this important bill in the last hours of the session, when the understanding is that no new matter is to be introduced, and introduces a provision by which we increase from 35 to 60 per cent. ad valorem the duty on vulcanized rubber.

Mr. SHERMAN. I said no new matter other than that which is already in the bill as sent to us by the House of Representatives. As a matter of course all this may be considered as new matter; but we introduce nothing; we propose no amendment of the law.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will move it to another part of the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. This part of the bill has nothing to do with rubber, except in connection with silk. Perhaps the Senator is mistaken about it. When rubber is used in silk goods, it may come in under this duty here fixed; but certainly the Senator's amendments ought not to be introduced here.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading will proceed.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was to strike out "50" in line 6 of section 2, and insert "40;" so as to make the clause read:

On all still wines imported in casks, 40 cents per gallon.

Mr. SARGENT. I dislike very much to take up time in debate at this stage of the session; but at the same time the provision of the House bill is very reasonable in this matter and gives only fair protection to an immense interest and is in favor of pure wines. The section of the House bill interests not only California but Ohio and many other States where the American wine interest is growing to be a very important industry, and more especially is it important in my State where our hills are covered with the finest vineyards and where our processes for making wine are improving every year. I really hope that the amendment of the committee will be withdrawn and that we may stand on the House bill. Only the exigency of this being the last day of the session prevents me urging the case at greater length.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state briefly to the Senate the whole of this matter. The present rate of duty actually collected on nearly all the wine imported into this country is 25 cents. It is a kind of specific and compound specific and ad valorem duty. That duty is very much evaded, and out of 8,000,000 gallons of wine imported, I think 6,000,000 come in at the rate of 25 cents. This is an increase of the duty on still wines and makes it uniform at 40 cents a gallon; and therefore it is largely in favor of the California and Ohio wine interest represented by the Senator from California and partly by myself. This was satisfactory to both sides. The trade desires a specific duty on all wines; and after the most careful examination and hearing both sides, both the wine-makers of the country and the wine importers, the committee decided to fix it at 40 cents. And we understood all were satisfied. We are assured that if the duty is put up to 50 cents a gallon, it will prohibit a large portion of wine now introduced, thus reducing the revenue instead of increasing it. The section as it now stands will give us perhaps $1,000,000 more revenue from wine, and we regard it as the most important feature of this bill.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask my friend whether, this being a specific duty of 40 cents, there is not an opportunity to bring in wines heavily charged with alcohol and distill them into brandy?

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator will see that the clause here provided is:

Provided, That any wines imported containing more than 24 per cent. of alcohol shall be forfeited to the United States.

Mr. SARGENT. I think this is a great relief, so far as it goes; but the amendment does not go quite so far as I want. I withdraw my objection, however, considering that it is some relief.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was in section 2, line 8, to strike out "$2" and insert "$1.60;" so as to read:

On all still wines imported in bottles, $1.60 per case of one dozen bottles, &c.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is part of the same matter.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was in section 2, lines 18 to 23, inclusive, to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, also, That there shall be an allowance of 2 per cent. for leakage on the quantity which shall appear by the gauge to be contained in any cask of wines, and 5 per cent. on all wines, liquors, cordials, and distilled spirits in bottles, to be deducted from the invoice quantity in lieu of breakage.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out line 8 of section 34 in the following words:

On hops, 10 cents per pound.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I hope this amendment will not be concurred in. I am not disposed to debate the question at this time. It would be unreasonable to do so. We are raising hops to some extent, and under the present tariff of 5 per cent. that interest is not protected sufficiently, and the hop-growers feel as though in view of the large importations there should be an increase of the tariff.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can only say that the present duty on hops is 5 cents a pound, not 5 per cent. That is equivalent to about 33 per cent. on hops. If the people of our country cannot raise hops with a protection of 33 per cent., I think it is perfect folly for us to talk about protecting them. We heard both sides and we thought the duty on hops ought to stand as it is, 5 cents a pound.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I call the Senator's attention to the point he has made that both sides were heard. He will remember that there were parties who wished to be heard, and on account of the shortness of time they were excluded.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the Senator himself represented one side very well.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I was merely reflecting others. I am not a grower of hops myself, nor a drinker of hops brewed, distilled, or otherwise. I was only representing the views of others, and I think the chairman will bear me out in the statement that I persisted in having the other side heard.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. The brewers and distillers of hops were heard largely, and I thought it was nothing more than fair that the growers should be heard. I hope that the amendment will be non-concurred in.

Mr. SHERMAN. I represent an agricultural State which grows some hops; and if we cannot compete in that simply agricultural product with a protective duty of 33 per cent., I think we ought to give up the raising of hops. We did hear the brewers who were very much opposed to this increase, and I thought we had heard the other side. However, the whole matter is in a nut-shell. Is not 33 per cent. a sufficient duty on hops?

Mr. WRIGHT. I only desire to say that there were two sides to the question in the committee, as the chairman will remember, and I desire that the vote shall be taken on the single proposition whether we shall strike out this item or not. It will be remembered that some members of the committee insisted on retaining the clause as it is. I am among that number.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope the amendment will not be concurred in. There is no reason on earth why all the hops required for use in the United States should not be raised in this country. I hope the amendment will not be concurred in, but that the duty will remain at the rate fixed by the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BAYARD. The present duty even of 5 cents per pound on hops is very heavy when rated in ad valorem. It amounts, I think, to something like 35 or 40 per cent.

Mr. SHERMAN. The value of the hops I think is somewhere from 10 to 15 cents in gold. The duty is 5 cents a pound.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not propose to detain the Senate, for I feel that to undertake the discussion of a bill of this character at this hour would be, to say the least, impracticable, if not impossible. Nevertheless where a proposition is made to double the duty upon an article of such large and general consumption, and in so important a branch of the manufactures of the country, upon which the excise duties depend so largely, it is a very serious question for the Senate to undertake to double that duty. You have now a duty of more than the average of the tariff on this article of American production; and in the face of that large duty you exported in the last five years a very large amount of hops. The exportation reached, I think, in the year 1871 or 1872 nearly seventeen million pounds. It is an enormous article of export. You therefore have the absurdity of a country able to export a very large amount of a commodity proposing to raise the duty on it, when it is simply and purely an interference with a business on which our excise revenue largely depends.

I have not at this moment, not anticipating this discussion, the tables of the exports of hops from the United States for the last five years; but I can say with confidence to the Senate that they have been very large; and in the face of our having an oversupply that we send to other countries, it is proposed now, without reason, to double the duty!

Mr. President, the article of hops enters largely into, and its chief consumption is in, the production of malt liquors. These malt liquors form a very large and very useful and as compared with other drinks harmless portion of the beverages of the country. The revenue of the Government to-day from the item of malt liquors alone amounts to about $9,000,000 a year. Do Senators propose hastily to interfere with a buisness of this magnitude? Do they propose to interfere with a business which is taxed, and one of the leading articles of taxation in the country, and without any reason in the world, as I have shown, to double the duty on an article so universally used and produced in this country to such an extent that the surplus must be exported and is exported in large quantities every year? What can be the meaning of such a tax? Nay, further, let us look at this subject in another way. The Senate has lately been made the scene of a discussion in respect to the matter of temperance. The abuse of alcoholic stimulants has been made the subject of grave congressional investigation. Any man who has considered the subject with that interest which I trust we all feel must be satisfied that one of the best steps toward a reformation of this alleged abuse is the substitution of a milder stimulant; and the use of the lighter beers and malt liquors is to be encouraged, in my opinion, and not to be discouraged.

I am not disposed, however, to treat this in the light of a sumptuary law; I dislike by law to invade the domain of morals and of individual taste; but I merely will say that upon the plainest grounds of political economy the imposition of a double tax, making it equivalent to about 70 per cent. ad valorem, upon an article entering into consumption so widely as does the article of hops, an article produced so abundantly by our soil, strikes me as being not only unwise, not only without warrant, but in every respect in which it can be viewed highly prejudicial.

I understood from that class of our citizens largely engaged in the consumption of hops that the hops imported are some from Austria and from Italy, and that there are certain kinds of beer made in this country which require a small amount of the infusion of the flavor of foreign hops in order to suit the taste of the public. Of course, as the Senator from Ohio reminds me, the great bulk of the hops used in this country is of American growth. I cannot tell precisely the proportion, but the enormous majority of the hops used is of American growth. We cultivate enough for that purpose, and the history of the last five years shows that our hop-growers have abundant protection.

On every ground I hope the action of the Committee on Finance will be sustained, and that this excessive increase of duty, so unnecessary in point of revenue and so absurdly unnecessary on the ground of what is called protection, may not be favored by the Senate, but that the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance will receive the approbation of the Senate.

Mr. SCHURZ. I think it must be clear to every one that if this bill is to pass it must pass without much discussion; and that can be accomplished only in one way, and that is by adopting all the amendments as they are reported by the committee. There are in this bill many good things and a great many things which I would not assent to. But as soon as the amendments of the committee are once interfered with then I give notice that I shall move a number of amendments, which undoubtedly will cause debate.

As far as this amendment is concerned, it must be clear to every unprejudiced man in the country that if the hop culture cannot flourish with a protection of 33 per cent. in its favor, it ought not to flourish. A large quantity of hops is imported for one very good reason, because hops of those varieties are needed. The hop culture can be stimulated in no better way than by importing foreign hops so far as is necessary for the purpose of improving the cultivation here. I hope the amendment will be made.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I do not wish to discuss the question; but out of compliment to the House of Representatives, the popular branch that reflects the will of the people, I feel as though my vote ought to be in accord with its action.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

The question being put, there were, on a division—ayes 30, noes 16.

Mr. WRIGHT. I think we had better have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 33, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Bogy, Boutwell, Cooper, Davis, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Ingalls, Kelly, McCreery, Merrimon, Morrill of Maine, Morton, Norwood, Ransom, Robertson, Sargent, Saulsbury, Schurz, Sherman, Sprague, Stevenson, Stockton, Tipton, Washburn, West, and Windom—33.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Carpenter, Chandler, Clayton, Conover, Edmunds, Ferry of Michigan, Gilbert, Howe, Mitchell, Oglesby, Pratt, Wadleigh, and Wright—14.

ABSENT—Messrs. Allison, Boreman, Brownlow, Buckingham, Cameron, Conkling, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Gordon, Harvey, Hitchcock, Johnston, Jones, Lewis, Logan, Morrill of Vermont, Patterson, Pease, Ramsey, Scott, Spencer, Stewart, and Thurman—26.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was in section 4, line 9, after "four" to strike out "and a half;" so as to read:

On chromate and bichromate of potassa, 4 cents per pound.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 4, line 11, after "vermicelli," to strike out "3 cents per pound" and insert "and" before "on," and after "on" insert the words "all similar," and after "preparations" strike out "similar thereto, 2," and insert "2;" so that the clause will read:

On macaroni and vermicelli and on all similar preparations, two cents per pound.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 4, line 16, before the word "cents" to strike out "quarter" and insert "tenth;" so that the clause will read:

On tin in plates or sheets and on terne and tagger's tin, 1.1 cents per pound.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 4, line 22, to strike out "one-half," and insert "five-eighths," and in line 25 to strike out "one-eighth," and insert "one-half;" so as to read:

On anchovies and sardines, packed in oil or otherwise, in tin boxes, 15 cents per whole box, measuring not more than five inches long, four inches wide, and three and one-half inches deep; 7½ cents for each half-box, measuring not more than five inches long, four inches wide, and one and five-eighths inches deep; and 4 cents for each quarter-box, measuring not more than four inches and three-quarters long, three and one-half inches wide, and one and one-half inches deep; when imported in any other form, 60 per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add to section 4 the following proviso:

Provided, That cans or packages made of tin or other material containing fish of any kind admitted free of duty under any existing law or treaty, not exceeding one quart in contents, shall be subject to a duty of 1½ cents on each can or package; and when exceeding one quart, shall be subject to an additional duty of 1½ cents for each additional quart, or fractional part thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Fnance was to strike out the following proviso at the end of section 7:

And provided further, That bags other than of American manufacture in which grain shall have been actually exported from the United States may be returned to the United States free of duty under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SARGENT. Before the question is put on striking out that proviso, I move to insert after the word "returned," in line 9, the word "empty;" so that it may read:

That bags other than of American manufacture, in which grain shall have been actually exported from the United States, may be returned empty to the United States free of duty, &c.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is no objection to that because they would have to be returned of course.

Mr. SARGENT. The proviso relates to grain-bags of foreign manufacture which have once been imported into the United States and paid duty. They are used to ship grain to the Liverpool market and to other foreign places. They are used by the million in shipment from the Pacific coast. We cannot ship in bulk on account of shifting the cargo and sweating the cargo, and so we have to resort to the very expensive process of using grain-bags. The House of Representatives provided that these bags might be returned under regulations of the Secretary of the Treasury without paying the duty over and over again. That clause we desire to have retained, and there are abundant precedents for it heretofore; as, for instance, petroleum casks are allowed to be returned free of duty a second time. I want to put in the word "empty," so as to remove any fear that they might be returned with something else; and then I ask that the amendment of the committee be not concurred in, but that the proviso remain. The amendment of the committee is to strike out the proviso that the bags may be returned free of duty.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I should like to know from the Senator from California or from the Senator from Ohio why jute-butts should not be on the free list?

Mr. SARGENT. I should be very happy indeed, on account of the enormous interest of my people in this matter, to have them on the free list; but I have not urged that on account of the condition of the revenue. To do that would be an enormous relief to our people, I admit. If I could hope that the Houses would agree to a provision of that kind I certainly would urge it; but meanwhile I take what I can reasonably get, and I therefore ask that we be allowed to return these grain-bags without paying duty for the second and third time and over and over again. I have no doubt that the Secretary of the Treasury can make the same regulations in the matter of grain-bags that he does in the matter of petroleum casks and other matters to prevent any fraud on the revenue.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I understand that the article provided for in this seventh section is not grown in this country at all, and it does not need any protection, and it would be a great relief if it were placed on the free list.

Mr. SHERMAN. The question now before us is whether grain-bags being sent abroad with grain in them shall be returned duty free. The committee struck out the proviso, having a great deal of doubt about it, but I do not myself see any objection to allowing these grain-bags, when they are returned empty, to come in free of duty.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. As I understand it, the question before the Senate is the adoption of the seventh section of the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Not at all. The question is on the amendment of the committee striking out the proviso, and that is a question every Senator can form a judgment upon at once, whether bags that have once paid duty and gone abroad with American produce in them shall be returned duty free. The committee thought the proviso ought to be stricken out; but as far as I am concerned I think it a doubtful question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California.

Mr. SARGENT. I believe I have said all I desire to say upon it. I do not want to take up time in debate. I trust the Senate will stand with me. It is the plainest provision in the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. The word "empty" is inserted.

Mr. SARGENT. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is due to the committee to state that the reason why they proposed to strike out this proviso was because of the absolute impossibility of identifying the bags and ascertaining whether or not they were the same bags, and of preventing fraud on the revenue by allowing all bags to be admitted duty free. The Senator from California will see, if he will look at section 9, that we provide "that barrels and grain-bags, the manufacture of the United States, when exported filled with American products, or exported empty and returned filled with foreign products, may be returned to the United States free of duty."

Mr. SARGENT. But those made in the United States are only a small part, a mere drop in the bucket, as compared with the number used. The great bulk of them we have to import from Dundee.

Mr. SHERMAN. The great difficulty is in identifying the particular bag.

Mr. SARGENT. There is not any more difficulty in the case of bags of foreign manufacture than in the case of bags of domestic manufacture. At any rate, the Secretary of the Treasury can prescribe the necessary regulations, and I should like to try the experiment of admitting these bags duty free.

Mr. SHERMAN. They can tell in a moment the difference between a home-manufactured and a foreign bag.

Mr. HAGER. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to the ninth section, which he referred to. It does not meet the case at all. The bags provided for there must be returned filled with foreign products. We wish to have the return of bags empty merely for the grain trade of California. We do not want to be required to bring them back filled with foreign articles, but we desire to have the privilege of returning the bags empty for the grain trade of California. That is a very important thing. The provision as it stands in section 7——

Mr. SHERMAN. If a bag is exported filled with American products, it may be returned either empty or filled.

Mr. HAGER. No; the language is "returned filled with foreign products may be returned to the United States free of duty." They must be filled with foreign products. We wish to have the privilege of returning them empty. That is not provided for in section 9. Therefore I hope section 7 will stand as it is. They can be returned under consular certificate without any difficulty at all. I hope the amendment of the committee will not be agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator is mistaken. Section 9 reads as follows:

That barrels and grain-bags, the manufacture of the United States, when exported filled with American products, or exported empty and returned filled with foreign products, may be returned to the United States free of duty.

In either case they may be brought in.

Mr. HAGER. If the Senator will consent to amend section 7 by inserting after the words "United States" the words "or upon which duties have once been paid to the United States," I have no objection; but there is no necessity of paying duties twice on these grain-bags. It is a hardship and unjust to impose a double tax upon the people of California in their efforts to maintain their relations with foreign countries in the exportation of grain.

Mr. BAYARD. I must confess that I think the amendment of the Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] to the clause proposed to be stricken out would be a proper one, and if it should be adopted I think we should disagree to the amendment of the committee striking out the proviso. When these grain-bags have once paid their duty and the Government has received its revenue from them, it is simply another illustration of the embarrassment of trade and commerce to say that when they come in again empty or used in the way they were first brought in, they shall be subjected to a second tax. Section 9, which has been referred to, provides that grain-bags of American manufacture, when exported filled with American products, or exported empty and then filled with the produce of other countries, shall not be taxed. If a man has once paid the duty on an imported article to the Government, why should it not be for all intents and purposes the same as if it were an American manufacture? If the duty has once been paid, why should it be taxed a second time?

The provision as it now stands is rather a facility to commerce, and we need all our facilities to commerce, especially in regard to our exports. No embarrassment should be thrown around them. I trust therefore that the motion of the Senator from California will prevail, that we shall amend this section so as to provide that these grain-bags may be returned empty, and then that the section may be retained in the bill as the House passed it.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I desire to state to the Senate that if the amendment of the committee is not agreed to by the Senate, in my judgment not a year will pass before every manufacturer of grain-bags in the United States will be prostrated. In addition to the present competition you introduce a new element; and under such loose provisions as these new bags as well as old ones will inevitably come in, and the result will be the destruction of this branch of industry. I speak not in the interest of the constituents whom I immediately represent, but there are grain-bag manufacturers throughout the United States, and this provision of the bill will in my judgment evidently prostrate that employment.

Mr. STEWART. This repetition of tariffs on grain-bags is very much embarrassing the agricultural pursuits of the Pacific coast. The grain there is shipped in bags altogether, while here you ship in bulk to a great extent. It is suggested that if we retain this proviso and pay the duty on grain-bags but once it will embarrass the manufacture of grain-bags. Now, I submit that it is equally important to refrain from embarrassing wheat-growing as manufacturing grain-bags. It is quite as important an interest, and I cannot see any justice or propriety in embarrassing the great wheat-growing interest of the country for the simple purpose of building up manufactures and sustaining them. It seems to me unjust to impose a tariff to such an extent for such a reason, which falls directly on production, limits production, limits exportation, limits your revenues, and limits your commerce. Wheat-growing is carried on to the very verge of bankruptcy on the part of those who are producing wheat. They do it as long as they can live by it; and the slightest burden imposed upon them operates to destroy the production of wheat. It seems to me if they pay duty once on their bags they should not be required to pay it a second time. If you say this provision cannot be executed, that the Government officers cannot determine whether they are the same bags or not, then I say the great wheat-growing interest demands that this duty on grain-bags should be removed altogether, and it will have to be done. If this proviso cannot be executed Congress will be certain, in view of this oppresive burden upon wheat-growing, to remove the duty altogether.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. In the committee I voted to retain this proviso, which is now desired to be retained by the Senator from California. It seems to me that it is carrying the doctrine of protection to an unreasonable extent to ask that, after an article has once paid duty and come in here, it shall not then stand on an equal footing with American manufactures. I would no more make a discrimination against an article after it has paid a duty and been once admitted here, than I would make a discrimination against a naturalized citizen coming in again from abroad.

Now, it is proposed to allow American bags to be exported and reimported without duty, but that we shall not allow foreign bags to be exported and reimported without duty. The Secretary of the Treasury is to prescribe regulations under which this is to be done. If he can prescribe regulations under which he will know whether a bag is an American bag or not, there is no more difficulty in prescribing regulations by which a foreign-made bag can be known. Therefore it seems to me unreasonable for us to stickle in the bark in relation to this proposition of the House. I shall vote for it.

Mr. SARGENT. Let us have a vote.

Mr. SPRAGUE. If the agriculturists of this country desire to extend the markets from whence they will derive their necessary articles three thousand or four thousand miles, then they are at perfect liberty to adopt a proposition of this sort; but I tell them they are injuring themselves at the same time, that they inevitably destroy one important branch of industry in the United States.

Mr. SARGENT. The amendment of the committee is to strike out the proviso. We want that voted down.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The Chair understood the Senator from California to move to insert the word "empty."

Mr. SARGENT. That was put in without objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the question is on agreeing to the amendment as reported by the committee, to strike out the proviso to the seventh section.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BAYARD. I desire to offer the following amendment to that section——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments of the committee have not yet been completed.

Mr. BAYARD. It will shorten the question to dispose of it now. I merely desire a vote upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is in order to proceed first with the amendment of the committee. The Chair will receive the amendment of the Senator from Delaware by unanimous consent.

Mr. SHERMAN. I must insist on the regular order—on this bill especially. The Senator can offer his amendment afterward.

Mr. BAYARD. Very well.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 8. That on and after the date of the passage of this act the importation of the articles enumerated and described in this section shall be exempt from duty; that is to say——

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to insert the words "from and after the 30th day of June, 1874," in lieu of the words "on and after the date of the passage of this act." I move that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was in section 8, line 6, to strike out from the free list—

Peas exclusively for seed purposes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 8, line 7, to strike from the free list "quicksilver."

Mr. STEWART. I hope that will not be done. The price of quicksilver is enormously high, so much so that it is becoming almost an embargo on the production of precious metals and no revenues are derived from it. The only effect of the duty is to keep up the price, which has got now so very high that it is almost destructive to a great interest. There is no reason for putting a tariff on quicksilver.

Mr. SHERMAN. Upon representations made to the Committee on Finance we concluded, upon a hearing, that it was best not to put quicksilver on the free list, but to leave it where it is now. If, however, the Senators from California, where this quicksilver is produced and consumed, say to us that they think on the whole it ought to be on the free list, I for one am disposed to change my vote.

Mr. HAGER. California produces quicksilver and it is used in extracting gold and silver from the quartz in the States of California and Nevada and in the Territory of Utah. It is very extensively used and it is extensively produced in California; but there is now an existing monopoly, that is to say, the European producers of quicksilver have entered into a combination with the producers in America by which the price is put so high as almost to make it necessary to resort to some other process.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will ask the Senator from California if he and his colleagues on the Pacific coast desire quicksilver to be placed on the free list?

Mr. HAGER. Yes, sir; I believe all of us on the Pacific coast favor putting it on the free list in order to relieve ourselves from the difficulty in which we are placed at this time.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was in section

9, line 1, to insert the word "and" between "barrels" and "grain-bags;" and after the word "include," in line 7, to strike out "boxes, barrels, exported in shooks," and insert "shooks" when returned as barrels or boxes as aforesaid;" so that the section will read:

SEC. 9. That barrels and grain-bags, the manufacture of the United States, when exported filled with American products, or exported empty and returned filled with foreign products, may be returned to the United States free of duty, under such rules and regulations as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury; and the provisions of this section shall apply to and include shooks, when returned as barrels or boxes as aforesaid.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 11, after the word "oaths," in line 4, to strike out "to such collector within three months" and insert "generally;" after the word "generally" insert "and;" and in line 7 to strike out "Comptroller of the Treasury" and insert "Commissioner of Customs;" so as to read:

That the oaths now required to be taken by subordinate officers of the customs may be taken before the collector of the customs in the district in which they are appointed, or before any officer authorized to administer oaths generally; and the oaths shall be taken in duplicate, one copy to be transmitted to the Commissioner of Customs, and the other to be filed with the collector of customs for the district in which the officer appointed acts, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in the proviso to section 13, line 15, after the word "collected" to strike out "or from other circumstances," and after the word "allowances," in line 17, to insert "but no such allowance shall be made except within one year after such services are rendered;" so as to read:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury, on the recommendation of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, be authorized to make such further allowances, from time to time, as may be reasonable, in cases in which, from the territorial extent of the district, or from the amount of internal duties collected, it may seem just to make such allowances; but no such allowance shall be made except within one year after such services are rendered.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 16, line 10, after the word "not" to insert "less than $100 nor;" and in line 12, after the word "not" to insert "less than thirty days;" so as to read:

That any person who shall carry on the business of a rectifier, wholesale liquor dealer, retail liquor dealer, wholesale dealer in malt liquors, retail dealer in malt liquors, or manufacturer of stills, without having paid the special tax as required by law, or who shall carry on the business of a distiller without having given bond as required by law, or who shall engage in or carry on the business of a distiller with intent to defraud the United States of the tax on the spirits distilled by him, or any part thereof, shall, for every such offense, be fined not less than $100 nor more than $5,000, and imprisoned not less than thirty days nor more than two years.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 18, line 33, after the word "packages," to strike out "where such assessments were," and in line 36, after the word "amended," to strike out "made;" so as to read:

Provided further, That any assessments of additional special tax against wholesale liquor dealers or retail liquor dealers, or against brewers for selling malt liquors of their own production at the place of manufacture in the original casks or packages, made by reason of an amendment to section 59 of the internal-revenue act approved July 20, 1868, as amended by section 13 of the act approved June 6, 1872, further amending said section 59 by striking out the words "malt liquor," "malt liquors," "brewer," and "malt liquors" in the three several paragraphs in which they occur, shall be, on proper proofs, remitted.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 23, as follows:

SEC. 23. That all acts and parts of acts imposing fines, penalties, or other punishment for offenses committed by an internal-revenue officer or other officer of the Department of the Treasury of the United States, or under any Bureau thereof, shall be, and are hereby, applied to all persons whomsoever, employed, appointed, or acting under the authority of any internal-revenue or customs law, or any revenue provision of any law of the United States, whether such persons are designated as officers or otherwise.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 24, as follows;

SEC. 24. That from and after the passage of this act any farmer or planter may sell, at the place of production, tobacco of his own growth and raising at retail directly to consumers to an amount not exceeding $100 annually, subject to such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. MERRIMON. I trust this section will not be stricken out. The internal revenue at best operates very harshly upon the producers in the tobacco-growing sections, and it would be very hard if they could not sell a few pounds of tobacco without paying a tax. I do not care to discuss it; but on concurring in that amendment I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call the attention of the Senate to this section. If it is retained, as a matter of course it will defeat this bill. The object of the bill is merely to clear certain difficulties which have arisen in the administration of the tariff and internal-revenue laws. This section, which was inserted in the House of Representatives against the advice of the Committee on Ways and Means, allows every man at every farm, at every cabin, to raise $100 worth of tobacco and sell it without regard to law. The passage of that section would, in my judgment, lose us eight or ten million dollars of tobacco tax. That was the statement made to us by manufacturers of tobacco in Virginia and manufacturers all over the country. The proposition to allow any person to sell of his own growth or raising $100 worth of tobacco annually without any tax whatever, without being required to pay any tax, would, in the opinion of the tobacco manufacturers, and I think of all intelligent persons who have examined the subject, actually destroy the tax on tobacco, which now yields us twenty-five or thirty million dollars. I have no doubt we should lose from five to ten million dollars of revenue. Therefore if you want to collect the present large tax on tobacco you must extend it to all. The provisions of the old law are ample to enable every person who raises it to sell it to licensed dealers, and there is ample competition all over the country. This section no doubt would be a great convenience to persons who raise small quantities of tobacco, by allowing them to sell it for the use and consumption of their own neighborhood. But there is no reason for it, and its effect would be absolutely destructive of the whole tobacco tax.

I think I have said enough to direct the attention of Senators to the importance of this section and the necessity of striking it out. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue supposed as a matter of course this would be stricken out; but he said if this section were adopted it would very greatly impair the tobacco tax, and the harm done by this section would be ten times more than the good that would be secured by the passage of this bill.

Mr. MERRIMON. I think if the internal-revenue officers would see the law properly executed the difficulty that the Senator anticipates would not arise. I am the more anxious for the adoption of this section because this provision of the internal-revenue law in my country is more odious than any other. The people regard it as a very great and intolerable burden. I think the Government loses a vast deal of its revenue growing out of the fact that there is no exception of this sort. I do not care to discuss the question. I simply call for the yeas and nays upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 33, nays 10; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Boutwell, Buckingham, Chandler, Clayton, Conover, Davis, Fenton, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamlin, Howe, Ingalls, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Scott, Sherman, Sprague, Stockton, Wadleigh, Washburn, West, Windom, and Wright—33.

NAYS—Messrs. Bogy, Cooper, Goldthwaite, Kelly, McCreery, Merrimon, Norwood, Ransom, Robertson, and Saulsbury—10.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Boreman, Brownlow, Cameron, Carpenter, Conkling, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry of Connecticut, Gilbert, Gordon, Hamilton of Texas, Harvey, Hitchcock, Johnston, Jones, Lewis, Logan, Morrill of Maine, Patterson, Sargent, Schurz, Spencer, Stevenson, Stewart, Thurman, and Tipton—30.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 25, as follows:

SEC. 25. That upon all manufactured tobacco exported under the provisions of any act of Congress, the manufacturer exporting the same shall be entitled to a drawback equal to the amount of duties which shall be shown to have been paid upon imported licorice which has entered into the manufacture thereof; and the quantity so used in such manufacture shall, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury be ascertained, and certified by the collector of internal revenue of the district from which the manufactured tobacco shall be removed for exportation to the collector of the port whence the same shall be exported, by whom the same shall be duly examined, and the amount of duties reported for drawback in accordance with the regulations of the Secretary of the Treasury; and the same shall be allowed and paid as in other like cases of drawback of duties on manufactured articles exported.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section 29, in the following words:

SEC. 29. That on and after the 1st day of July next there shall be levied and paid a tax on all sales of stocks, bonds, gold and silver bullion, coin, and other securities, at the rate of $\frac{1}{20}$ of 1 per cent. on the amount of the sale thereof; that every person, firm, or corporation engaged in the business of selling stocks, bonds, gold and silver bullion, coin, and other securities, either for their own account or on the account of others, shall keep a true and accurate record thereof, under oath, that the same is true and correct, to the collector of the district where such business is carried on, on or before the 1st and 15th day of each month, and the collector shall thereupon assess and collect a tax of $\frac{1}{20}$ of 1 per cent. on the gross amount of such sales. The said list or return shall be made in such form or manner as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to call the attention of the chairman to the twenty-eighth section, which is an extension of the time for the redemption of direct-tax lands. I ask whether there was not a bill passed here on Saturday covering that ground?

Mr. SHERMAN. It passed here, but it may not pass the House. I think the same provision had better be made here also.

Mr. WRIGHT. I thought it was a House bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; it was a Senate bill. I think that section had better be retained here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment striking out the twenty-ninth section.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT. That is the last of the amendments of the committee, I believe.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments of the committee are completed.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, two years ago, when the act of 1872 was passed, I announced upon the floor of the Senate that I hoped there would be no further change in the tariff laws for five years to come. It was with exceeding reluctance that I agreed to report a bill making even these changes unless a general revision was necessary; but for the purpose of securing some needed changes in the internal-revenue laws and correcting some revealed defects in the act, these few amendments have been agreed to, with one or two which are necessary to increase the revenue and which require immediate action.

There are several subjects upon which I should like to amend this bill, particularly by a repeal of the second section of the act of 1872, by imposing a tax on the deposits in national banks and in private banks on which they pay interest—I mean deposits upon call, or for a period of not more than thirty days, and also a provision with regard to the limitation of suits under the internal-revenue laws. All these I should like to offer; but it is manifest that if we begin to offer amendments on this bill we shall defeat all that is in it, and probably defeat action upon the subject altogether. I therefore shall refrain for the present from offering any of these amendments, in the hope that we can obtain immediate and favorable action upon the bill; but if other Senators deem it their duty to offer amendments to this bill so as to give rise to any protracted debate, then of course I shall not only feel at liberty, but shall deem it my duty to my constituents to offer the amendments in which I feel such great interest.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Senator from Pennsylvania has expressed precisely what is my own position. There are sundry amendments which I would myself very much like to offer to this bill, amendments which I deem important, but acting precisely in that line of duty which guides and directs the Senator from Pennsylvania, I shall refrain from offering any amendments, believing it better and wiser now to do the little—and there is something—which this bill accomplishes than hazard all by attempting to do that which we cannot accomplish.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask that on the vote upon section 24 my vote be changed from "yea" to "nay," from the fact that I voted under a misapprehension. I supposed the question was on agreeing to the section. It will not change the result.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That cannot be done. The rule positively prohibits it.

Mr. DAVIS. Then I shall reserve section 24 for separate action in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator accomplishes his object by making the statement to go in the RECORD.

Mr. BAYARD. I have heard what the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] has said and I concur with him. I will not profess that this measure meets my approbation. Neither the frame-work of the measure nor the tendencies are those that I desire, and I am sorry that the tariff question should be submitted to this kind of patch-work at the end of the session. Yet nevertheless the bill has been prepared, and I do not propose to risk the labor of so many gentlemen by making amendments, although I consider them just and proper. There are several that I desire earnestly to offer and earnestly to recommend to the Senate; but looking to the expression of opinion by the Senator from Pennsylvania and others that they do not propose at this stage to embarrass and perhaps defeat the entire measure, I shall not press the amendments that I had intended to offer or make the opposition to many that I had intended to make. I think on all these questions of a general public law there must be a consideration of the entire case and a consideration of the labors and the opinions of our associates here as well as of our own. I think that is a proper and catholic spirit of legislation, and for that reason I shall follow the example of my friend from Pennsylvania, and abstain from impeding the passage of this bill and hazarding the loss of the bill by amendments offered at this stage.

Mr. FENTON. In view of what has been said by other Senators, I feel constrained to withhold several amendments which I had intended to offer to this bill. I am satisfied that it is the sense of the Senate to pass the bill in the shape recommended by the Finance Committee without further amendment or change. So, while I feel that the bill is in some respects very unsatisfactory, acting as do other Senators who also have a desire to further amend the bill, I shall not urge the amendments which I had intended to present.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I desire the ear of the Senator from Ohio. This bill, by reason of the amendments already passed, will have to go to the House again, as I understand.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will say that the proper committee of the House have already considered every amendment that has been adopted.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I have a number of amendments which I should like to offer, and I am very sorry that the bill has not been considered at a time when it could be amended. There is one amendment which I would ask the Senator from Ohio whether it would embarrass the bill to make or not, and that is on the sixth page, ninth and tenth lines of section 8. There is a manufactory of spurs and stilts which has been established in this country. The free list of this bill includes "spurs and stilts used in the manufacture of earthen, stone, or crockery ware." All parties engaged in the manufacture of earthen, stone, and crockery ware, as well as these manufacturers of spurs and stilts, desire the item stricken from the free list. I do not suppose it would be any embarrassment just to strike that from the free list.

Mr. SHERMAN. That little item of spurs and stilts was very carefully considered in both Houses. We heard the parties on both sides and we came to the conclusion that it was better to leave it where it is now. It would embarrass the bill to take it off the free list.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. There is but one manufactory in the United States, and that is in New Jersey.

Mr. SHERMAN. We know that; but as a matter of course all these people have to use the stilts.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. There is no other State where they make as much crockery or earthen ware as in New Jersey, and the manufacturers there request it. I move to strike out those lines. It will not create any embarrassment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state that I have quite a number of papers about this particular item, and I can make a statement that will satisfy the Senate that we are right. The House committee put this in, and the Senate committee after full examination concurred. I do not want to debate it. I hope the question will be put and the amendment voted down.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey to strike out on the ninth and tenth lines of section 8.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. This is a very small manufacture, and it has got its growth in New Jersey, as the Senator from New Jersey says. It seems to me that it is a hardship to strike it down. I hope therefore that the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey will prevail.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey.

The Chair put the question and declared that the noes appeared to prevail.

A division was called for.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senate is to be divided on this question, I desire to send for some papers to show the reasons why the committee acted as they did. If we open the door to amendment, there is an end to the bill.

The question being again put, the amendment was rejected—ayes 10, noes not counted.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I wish to reserve the amendment in regard to the duty on tin plates unless the suggestion I made to the chairman of the committee should lead him to change that.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to the reservation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The remaining amendments made as in Committee of the Whole will be considered as concurred in.

Mr. WRIGHT. I desire that the vote in Committee of the Whole on the last section shall be reserved for action in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be reserved. The question is on concurring in the other amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask for a separate vote on the twenty-fourth section, because I voted upon it under a misapprehension.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be reserved.

The remaining amendments were concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first reserved amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 4, line 16, the Senate as in Committee of the Whole struck out "quarter" and inserted "tenth" after "one," so as to make the clause read:

On tin in plates or sheets and on terne and taggers' tin, 1.1 cents per pound.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not understand the Senator from Massachusetts as proposing any amendment to the section, but he doubts the policy of a specific duty on tin plates.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I do not object to the rate of duty, but I do apprehend that there will be frauds upon the revenue in consequence of a change from ad valorem to specific duties. I am not sufficiently acquainted with the mechanical processes to state as a matter of opinion even what the results may be; but the duty on Banca tin at 15 per cent. amounts to about 4½ cents a pound; that is, the metal called tin. I can imagine from what I have seen and heard that plates which are of iron may be heavily loaded with tin beyond the quantity required for the ordinary purposes to which tin plates are put, and received in this country at $1\frac{1}{10}$ cents a pound; and then this extra loading may be taken off and tin introduced at $1\frac{1}{10}$ cents instead of 4½ cents a pound. I make the suggestion. I do not know what will happen, but that is what I anticipate.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator from Massachusetts could suggest to me a more specific definition of the article than is contained in these two lines, I would accept his definition. As a matter of course tin in its pure state is a very expensive article; but tin in plates or sheets as in the ordinary article of commerce is quite different. The great body of it is iron. As a matter of course, this duty of $1\frac{1}{10}$ cents a pound is on "tin in plates or sheets and on terne and taggers' tin." This does not change the existing rate of duty on the article the Senator mentions; but he thinks that by fraud or by the free use of the article with another, making a new article, the revenue may be defrauded. That may be so now. The same opportunity might apply under a specific as an ad valorem duty.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The honorable chairman will see the difference, that if iron plates were now under an ad valorem duty heavily loaded with Banca tin, that is the pure metal, beyond the quantity necessary for the uses to which tin plates are applied, the cost of the plates on the other side would be augmented precisely in proportion to the quantity of the pure metal used. But now if you put a specific duty by the pound upon tin plates, the weight of which ordinarily is chiefly iron, there is an opportunity furnished for those who might be disposed to avail themselves of it to load these plates heavily with the pure metal and introduce the whole body at 1.1 cents a pound and then remove the surplus quantity of Banca tin which by itself would be subject to a duty of about 4½ cents a pound, and get an advantage of 3½ cents a pound on the importation of the pure metal.

Mr. SHERMAN. The only change proposed by this bill is a change that has been recommended by the Treasury Department, has been demanded by the dealers in this article, has been called for by the custom-house officers and by everybody, and it is recommended by the President, that is that we should as far as practicable change the ad valorem into specific duties. The duty now proposed to be imposed on tin in sheets is a little higher than the present ad valorem duty; but the present ad valorem duty has given rise to a great deal of litigation, to a great deal of trouble, and many lawsuits and controversies without number. It has given rise to oppression and abuse as charged on one side, and to fraud on the other.

Under these circumstances it is of the highest importance to have a specific duty if practicable on the article of tin in plates; and the suggestion now made, just at the heel of this debate, is the first suggestion I have ever heard from any one that this article was more subject to frauds under a specific duty than under an ad valorem duty. If the Senator would suggest to me an amendment providing that if tin plates were charged more than their due and ordinary proportion with pure tin, they should be confiscated or should be subject to an ad valorem duty, I would accept the amendment without hesitation; but there can be no difficulty between now and the next session. I do not believe there is any danger of surcharging tin plates with too much tin in order to take it off here and evade a trifling duty. I think it is rather a fanciful danger than a real one. At any rate, it is one that has never been suggested to the committee of either House, and never so far as my attention has been called to the subject been mentioned by any one either in the customs-revenue service or in the trade. I hope therefore the Senator will run the risk till the next session of Congress at least of any possible fraud.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The committee must run the risk. I only felt it to be my duty with the present ideas I have to make known to the committee what I fear.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator had made this difficulty known to the committee earlier, when we were considering the bill, we should probably have tried to guard against it. I have invited him to suggest an amendment, but he is not now prepared to do so.

Mr. BOUTWELL. No amendment would avail except to strike out the line. You cannot put a specific duty on tin plates that would admit of their importation and guard against the fraud which I apprehend.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I think that the idea of the Senator from Massachusetts is entirely imaginary. In the first place, if the tin should be melted off these plates what would the iron plates be worth? In the next place, why should the importer go to that immense amount of labor to get the tin when he can import it free without any such trouble? It is now free in the shape of raw material.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Do you say so?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Yes, sir.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Where is the law?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Here it is. [Handing a book to Mr. BOUTWELL.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. If it is free of course there is no danger; but if it is not free, it could be done just as easy as not.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I was looking at the law of 1871, which imposes a duty of 13 per cent. I see now there is no danger.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is all right then?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next reserved amendment is to strike out the twenty-fourth section.

The Chief Clerk read the section, as follows:

SEC. 24. That from and after the passage of this act any farmer or planter may sell at the place of production tobacco of his own growth and raising at retail directly to consumers to an amount not exceeding $100 annually, subject to such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. DAVIS. That is a section in which the State that I in part represent has a considerable interest and the people living in that region of country. I ask for a division on the section. I do not wish to take time by calling for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendment to strike out the twenty-fourth section.

The amendment was concurred in; there being on a division—ayes 38, noes 13.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next reserved amendment is to strike out the twenty-ninth section.

The Chief Clerk read the section, as follows:

SEC. 29. That on and after the 1st day of July next there shall be levied and paid a tax on all sales of stocks, bonds, gold and silver bullion, coin, and other securities, at the rate of $\frac{1}{20}$ of 1 per cent. on the amount of the sale thereof; that every person, firm, or corporation engaged in the business of selling stocks, bonds, gold and silver bullion, coin, and other securities, either for their own account or on the account of others, shall keep a true and accurate record thereof, under oath, that the same is true and correct, to the collector of the district where such business is carried on, on or before the 1st and 15th day of each month, and the collector shall thereupon assess and collect a tax of $\frac{1}{20}$ 1 per cent. on the gross amount of such sales. The said list or return shall be made in such form or manner as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

The amendment was concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

THE POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. RAMSEY. Now, Mr. President, I move that the Senate resume the consideration of House bill No. 3604, sometimes called the post-route bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3604) to establish certain post-routes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read.

Mr. MORTON. I hope nobody wants to hear that read. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. It will take but a short time.

Mr. RAMSEY. Let this bill pass first.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It will not pass without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. DAVIS. I think it very important that the post-route bill should be passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is not debatable. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

The motion was not agreed to.

EXECUTIVE BUSINESS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is some business that I have in charge and some in which I feel a very deep interest, and nothing but this post-route bill being up, I ask to have the eighteenth rule read, and then I will see whether I can say anything to the Senate that public interests require to be stated or not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The rule will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

18. On a motion made and seconded to shut the doors of the Senate, on the discussion of any business which may, in the opinion of a Senator, require secrecy, the Presiding Officer shall direct the gallery to be cleared; and during the discussion of such motion the doors shall remain shut.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the doors be closed under the eighteenth rule.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I second the motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The motion is seconded by the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to have the rule read again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The rule will be read.

The Chief Clerk read Rule 18.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the motion seconded?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAMLIN. The post-route bill is now before the Senate; it is within our control now. I suggest that we had better go into executive session, and when we come out the bill will be up; there will be no necessity for a vote to take it up. Making this suggestion with the consent of the Senator from Vermont, other business having now intervened, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. RAMSEY. Very well.

Mr. SHERMAN. Allow me a moment. I shall vote for the motion of the Senator from Maine, but before the precedent now sought to be set is established, I wish to say that before a Senator can of his own will turn everybody out of the galleries and close the Senate he must state himself, upon his responsibility as a Senator, that upon the pending question, in the language of the rule, the public interest demands that the galleries should be cleared. When he has made that statement under the rule he probably can at any time clear the galleries.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This is an interesting question.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator ought to state——

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator would be a little wiser if he would read the rule.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Senator to read it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will read it:

On a motion made and seconded to shut the doors of the Senate, on the discussion of any business which may, in the opinion of a Senator, require secrecy——

Mr. SHERMAN. He must state his opinion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Be kind enough to let me read the rule through—the Presiding Officer shall direct the gallery to be cleared; and during the discussion of such motion the doors shall remain shut.

I made the motion and stated that there was business to be discussed which I thought (as of course I must think as to executive business) requires secrecy, and business of high importance. Thereupon I make the motion that the doors be shut, and I have a precedent for what I say, a motion made by the colleague of my friend from Maine, now deceased, (Mr. Fessenden,) where we had a question which ought to be considered in secret session, not "the pending question" which was before the body on the bill that happened to be up for the relief of John Jones, or for a post-route, but matters within the possession of the Senate, and the motion was made, the matter was considered, and the doors were closed. Although it is of no consequence at this time probably, for everybody now, I believe, is willing to go into executive session, I beg leave to state to the Senator from Ohio that he is mistaken in supposing that a Senator must state that the pending question before the Senate it is necessary to discuss in secrecy. The question is whether there is any business before the Senate which in the conscientious judgment of a Senator requires that the doors should be immediately closed that it may be considered.

The President of the United States may send a message to this body at this moment of the highest importance to the national interests, of a confidential character, and it may be that an opposition to the Administration would say, "We intend to drag this session through before you can have the message communicated to the Senate for its action, in order that it may judge whether it will prolong its session or whatever may be necessary." And therefore, inasmuch as Senators cannot say that the post-route bill requires secrecy, this motion cannot be made. The Senator has forgotten the history of this ancient rule, and the motives for it. What were they? When the Senate was small, and it was supposed every Senator understood what the confidential business before the Senate was, when any subject that a Senator thought required secrecy and action was before the Senate—I do not mean up for debate in public, but in possession of the Senate, on its table yet unopened—he might take the responsibility, subject of course to public disgust and all that sort of thing by his brother Senators if he was making a frivolous demand, of having the doors closed.

I only mention this in vindication of the rule and in vindication of myself. I can state that I think I am entirely within the eighteenth rule, and that I have a perfectly satisfactory motive for it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before the question is put—lest this might be a precedent, and a very inconvenient one in practice—I wish again to call attention to the language of the rule to show the meaning of it, and I could go into the history of it if I chose:

On a motion made and seconded to shut the doors of the Senate, on the discussion of any business which may, in the opinion of a Senator, require secrecy.

The "business" must be pending under discussion. Then any Senator has a right to say, "I desire to make some statement to the Senate in regard to this question under discussion which in my opinion demands secrecy; I do not choose to give it to the galleries around me;" and on that motion being seconded then the Senate must perforce, willing or unwilling, give the opportunity to the Senator to state what he desires, in confidence, to the Senate. That is the rule. But I have no objection to an executive session now. I agree that we ought to proceed to the consideration of executive business, but I do not want this to be made a precedent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It has been acted on over and over again, and my construction is the safest way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The question being put, there were, on a division—ayes 21, noes 11; no quorum voting.

Mr. SARGENT. We had better have the yeas and nays. ["No!" "No!"]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a quorum present and the Chair will put the question again.

The question being again put, there were, on a division—ayes 27, noes 14.

So the motion was agreed to.

DETROIT ARSENAL.

Mr. KELLY. I wish to make a report before the doors are closed. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3435) to provide for the sale of the buildings and grounds known as the Detroit arsenal, in the State of Michigan, to report it back with amendments; and I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That will not do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed on the Calendar, objection being made to its present consideration.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After three hours spent in executive session the doors were reopened at four o'clock and five minutes p. m.

While the doors of the Senate Chamber were closed the following legislative business was transacted:

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 7) for the creation of a court for the adjudication and disposition of certain moneys received into the Treasury under an award made by the tribunal of arbitration constituted by virtue of the first article of the treaty concluded at Washington the 8th of May, A. D. 1871, between the United States of America and the Queen of Great Britain.

No. 3256) to repeal so much of the act approved May 8, 1872, entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1873, and for other purposes, as provides for the employment of persons to assist the proper officers of the Government in discovering and collecting moneys withheld, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3168) making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. PHILETUS SAWYER of Wisconsin, Mr. GEORGE W.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The doors having been opened,

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. We have received from the House of Representatives the report of the committee of conference on the Geneva award bill. I move to proceed to its consideration.

Mr. RAMSEY. That postpones the post-route bill, which is regularly before the Senate.

Mr. WEST. I desire to offer a report from the committee of conference on the post-office appropriation bill, having been advised by the member in charge from the House that the House is waiting to consider that report. I ask the Senate to judge between the two reports, whether they will consider the Geneva conference report or the report on the post-office appropriation bill, with almost the assurance that the debate on the Geneva award bill will detain the Senate some hours.

Mr. RAMSEY. May I say a word in behalf of the bill that I have been urging for two weeks and have at last got before the Senate? There seems to be some malign purpose on the part of gentlemen to crowd out that bill and prevent its passage during this session. I hope gentlemen will defer their reports until the post-route bill is disposed of. I ask the Chair what will be the effect of entertaining these propositions or either of them? Would it displace the bill now up?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The post-route bill being before the Senate, the Senator from New Jersey or any other Senator can move to postpone that bill.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I move to postpone that bill.

Mr. RAMSEY. I hope that will not be done.

Mr. STEVENSEN. I suggest to the Senator from New Jersey, as I do not wish to antagonize the presentation of his report upon the Geneva award, that he had better fix some hour this evening for considering it; and I will state my reason for this suggestion. There are a great many bills from the House, not only the bill of the Senator from Minnesota, but other bills from the House, of an important character, each of which it will not take a minute to pass; and by fixing a certain hour when we can reach the Geneva-award bill, which is certain to elicit debate and perhaps consume the whole of the evening, we can attend to that without losing a great many bills which we can now pass.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I shall ask the Senate to vote upon the motion which I have made. The Geneva-award report ought to elicit no debate whatever, for the result of the conference which has been arrived at pays those that every member of the Senate and every member of the House of Representatives voted should be paid, and it pays no one else, and it leaves the fund subject to future disposition and to claims by the war-premium men, the insurance men, and those who have lost by other vessels than those included in the bill. The simple question is whether, when a conference has arrived at an agreement which pays those whom every member of Congress of both Houses say should be paid, the Senate will deprive them of their money.

Mr. WEST. I understand the Senator from New Jersey moves to take up the report of the conference committee on the Geneva award.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey moves to postpone the pending order and proceed to the consideration of that report.

Mr. WEST. I move to amend the motion of the Senator from New Jersey, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the post-office appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion is not in order.

Mr. RAMSEY. I hope the Senate will vote down both motions and allow the post-route bill to pass. It cannot possibly occupy over thirty minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I do not think that a question of this importance ought to be disposed of on the run. At the last session of Congress we passed the bill through the Senate as it was passed at this session almost word for word. It went to the House of Representatives and was met with an amendment of the character substantially of that of this year. We had a conference; and the conferees on the part of the Senate, containing my honorable friend from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] as one of them, after we had exhausted all other means of getting at a result that would dispose of the whole question, proposed to the House conferees that we had just passed the Senate bill which provided for a class of citizens in respect to whom everybody said indemnification ought to be made and would remit to the next Congress the question which other citizens raised with the Government in respect to their claims. The whole body of the Senate conferees, I say, a year ago, including the Senator from Ohio, proposed to the House conferees, inasmuch as we could all agree as to one class of our citizens, that justice, good faith, honor, and every sentiment which belongs to fair dealing required us to provide for them now, and leave questions that we could not solve to be settled in the future. The House conferees refused to do that, and insisted that we should do more or the less, as the case might be, or nothing should be done. The House stood by them upon that, and accordingly nothing was done.

This year the conference again meets upon the same substantial attitude between the two Houses, and the House conferees, instead of refusing to do that which they refused to do last year, pressed by this sense of justice to people whom all sides agree ought to have their money, have agreed to a report which simply gives to the owners of the vessels who were uninsured, and their captains and crews, the money that they are entitled to, and in terms leaves the subject of other disputed questions and claims to the future disposition of Congress. Can anybody say that that is not equitable and right? That is all it does.

Then when you come to the suggestion of the other Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] that the clause about the payment in gold being stricken out doubles the claim, let me tell the Senator, from a pretty careful investigation that we made of that subject, that the clause paying in gold nearly doubles the claims. There is the difference. I suggested that to the Senate in the confusion and hurry when the bill was up before; but as nobody was listening, as I assume, the motion of the Senator from Ohio was made and carried putting in the clause providing for payment in gold, which makes an arbitrary standard when gold and the values of shipping and of the cargoes and all other things were different at different times. Some men by this gold rule would be almost ruined in getting their pay now; others would make large profits, depending upon the particular period of time when the destruction took place, as all our values, as everybody knows, were currency values. So we pay the currency value, which gives justice and uniformity to all classes of the people.

Mr. President, I shall be surprised and sorry to see the Senate of the United States say to the uninsured owners of the ships that were sunk on the high seas or burned up, and to their crews and officers and to the merchants who had uninsured property on board those ships, "We refuse to give you your money that our agents a year ago insisted should be given and we did, but the House failed to do it; and now that the House has done it, we will turn around and refuse to do this which we unanimously agreed ought to be done, because we are unable to agree with the House to do something else." That is precisely what the question is; and, as I say, a year ago on that question the conferees of the Senate were unanimous in their action, and so reported to the Senate of the United States.

Now, I do not see upon what ground it is that my friend from Ohio who sits farthest from me [Mr. THURMAN] should find it to be his duty to refuse to do this on account of his views upon another branch of the subject, when that other branch of the subject is left open for the action of the next session of Congress. Here is a class of our citizens whose vessels and cargoes have been destroyed on the high seas and in respect of whom the United States has recovered a certain indemnity, and as to those everybody says they ought to have the measure of the just losses they have incurred. This report of the conference committee gives it to them and does not undertake to decide any other question at all. It leaves all the rest of the question exactly where it was before, so that at a future session any insurance company, any war-premium man, any person injured by the cruisers outside of the time named, stands on exactly the same footing where he stands at this moment to have his claim considered. Yet here are these people whose claims we have considered and all parties agree ought to have their money, some of them sailors and officers who have little else in this world to rely upon, some of them whose whole property was involved in these ships uninsured that were destroyed, and who have now been delayed too long, upon the simple ground that there are questions connected with this subject which we cannot now decide.

It does appear to me that it would be an inexcusable act of injustice to fail to agree to report, inasmuch as it appears to me clearly from the reading of it that all other questions are left without any prejudice to the rights of any claimant who may come forward at the next session.

Mr. FLANAGAN. I do hope that the bill before the Senate will not be postponed. It is an important one. Every State is directly and deeply interested in a post-route bill. The other is a matter as to the merits of which I have nothing to say, but in due time it will come up. But the bill regularly before the Senate now must necessarily be returned to the House for action on our amendments, and I hope the Senate will stand by it and dispose of it.

Mr. WEST. What is the pending question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is, will the Senate postpone the post-route bill and proceed to consider the report of the committee of conference on the Geneva award bill, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. THURMAN. If the report of the conference committee were clearly and unequivocally, without any ambiguity whatever, what the Senator from Vermont supposes it to be, and if there were no other thing in it that was objectionable, there would not have been a divided report from the Senate managers. But I apprehend that that is not the nature of this report; and whenever it shall be taken up, I hope to be able to satisfy the Senate that the Senator from Vermont is mistaken in what he supposes to be the character of this report. I think that which is reported is an extremely dangerous proposition, and I hope that I may have the attention of the Senate, when the time comes whenever it shall be taken up, to explain why I think so. I am as willing and as anxious as the Senator from Vermont or anybody else to pay, and to pay without one moment's delay, those persons who we all agree are entitled to be paid. The Senate knows I was last year, and I am so again; but I do not want anybody to be deceived about the effect of this bill should it become a law.

But the question now is shall the other measure be postponed and this taken up, and under that I have no right to discuss the merits of this conference report. I therefore refrain from saying anything about them until the report shall be taken up.

Mr. RAMSEY. I hope the Senate will now adhere to the post-route bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall vote for taking up the first conference report that is offered. Here we are in the last hours of the session and we have to act upon both these reports, and we must do it to-night. There is no help for it, if we set sixty hours in consecutive session. I hope we shall waste no time. I shall vote to consider the first conference report that comes in. Which of these reports has now the preference?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. This.

Mr. SHERMAN. What is the question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Will the Senate postpone the post-route bill and proceed to the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the Geneva award bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall vote to postpone everything to take up a conference report at this stage of the session.

Mr. WEST. To take up the Geneva award bill now is absolutely to kill the post-office appropriation bill.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. O, no!

Mr. WEST. Yes; this Geneva award bill will be talked all night.

The question being taken on Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN'S motion by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 15, nays 38; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Boutwell, Buckingham, Carpenter, Chandler, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Oglesby, Sherman, Washburn, and Wright—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Boreman, Clayton, Conover, Cooper, Davis, Fenton, Flanagan, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Kelly, Lewis, McCreery, Merrimon, Mitchell, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Ransom, Robertson, Sargent, Saulsbury, Sprague, Stevenson, Stockton, Thurman, Wadleigh, West, and Windom—38.

ABSENT—Messrs. Allison, Brownlow, Cameron, Conkling, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Ferry of Connecticut, Ferry of Michigan, Hamilton of Texas, Johnston, Jones, Logan, Morton, Norwood, Schurz, Scott, Spencer, Stewart, and Tipton—20.

So the motion was not agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 3256) to repeal so much of the act approved May 8, 1872, entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1873, and for other purposes," as provides for the employment of persons to assist the proper officers of the Government in discovering and collecting moneys withheld, and for other purposes; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 59) amending joint resolution of April 16, 1872, relating to a statue of the late Admiral Farragut.

DISTRICT GOVERNMENT—JOINT COMMITTEE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under section 5 of an act for the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, being House bill No. 3680, a joint select committee is provided for, two members to be appointed by the Presiding Officer of the Senate and two by the Speaker of the House. Under that section the Chair appoints Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, and Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland, the members of the committee on the part of the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had appointed Mr. R. C. PARSONS, of Ohio, a conferee on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 3168) making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors and for other purposes, in place of Mr. GEORGE W. MCCRARY, of Iowa, excused.

POST-ROUTE BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The post-route bill is before the Senate.

Mr. WEST. I think it is pretty well known to every Senator that it is not much worth while to consider the post-route bill unless you have the money with which to run your mails over the routes; and there is another consideration on which I shall appeal to certain members of the Senate, who will understand precisely that it was agreed that appropriation bills should have priority over other matters. The House of Representatives at the present moment has no business to consider on appropriation bills from the fact that we do not send them over to them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not in order.

Mr. WEST. It may not be in order, but I have stated the fact; and if it is not in order I will withdraw it. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAMSEY. What is the use of appropriating money unless you have some use for it?

Mr. WEST. We have plenty of use for the money. I move to postpone the post-route bill for the purpose of considering the report from the committee of conference on the post-office appropriation bill.

Mr. DAVIS. I suggest to the Senator from Minnesota that he just lay his bill aside informally in order to allow the conference report to be made. It will only take a moment.

Mr. RAMSEY. If I do, I must do the same thing with the other report.

Mr. DAVIS and Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. O, no.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the pending order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is the motion to postpone the post-route bill and proceed to the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the post-office appropriation bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Has the post-route bill been read?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has not been.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It must be read before it is debated.

Mr. WEST. Must it be read before it is proceeded with?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes.

Mr. WEST. If we have to stand that——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I only want to remind my friend from Louisiana that there is some liberty left, and now I withdraw for his motion. The bill need not be read now; but I withdraw the call for the reading, subject to its being read when it is taken up for action.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Louisiana moves to postpone the post-route bill.

Mr. DAVIS. Only informally.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No sir; nothing is done informally.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Louisiana moves to postpone the post-route bill and proceed to the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the post-office appropriation bill.

The question being put a division was called for, and the yeas were 32.

Mr. RAMSEY. As this will involve the loss of the post-route bill, I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GORDON. I should like to inquire the effect of this vote. Will the effect be to displace the post-route bill entirely?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will.

Mr. SHERMAN. It can come up again on motion.

Mr. DAVIS. Is it in order to amend the motion of the Senator from Louisiana, so as to lay the post-route bill aside informally?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. SARGENT. That can be done by general consent.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask unanimous consent that it be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia asks unanimous consent to lay aside the post-route bill informally and proceed to the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the post-office appropriation bill.

Mr. RAMSEY. The same request has been refused in the other case.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. It will not be refused now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection.

Mr. RAMSEY. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The roll-call will proceed.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 27, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Boutwell, Buckingham, Carpenter, Davis, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Hager, Hamilton of Maryland, Hitchcock, McCreery, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Oglesby, Sargent, Saulsbury, Scott, Sherman, Sprague, Stockton, Thurman, Washburn, West, Windom, and Wright—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Bogy, Boreman, Chandler, Clayton, Conover, Cooper, Dennis, Fenton, Flanagan, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamlin, Kelly, Lewis, Logan, Merrimon, Mitchell, Norwood, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ramsey, Ransom, Robertson, Stevenson, and Wadleigh—26.

ABSENT—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Brownlow, Cameron, Conkling, Cragin, Dorsey, Ferry of Connecticut, Ferry of Michigan, Hamilton of Texas, Harvey, Howe, Ingalls, Johnston, Jones, Morton, Schurz, Spencer, Stewart, and Tipton—20.

So the motion of Mr. WEST was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had non-concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3572) to amend existing customs and internal-revenue laws, and for other purposes, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HENRY L. DAWES of Massachusetts, Mr. WILLIAM D. KELLEY of Pennsylvania, and Mr. JAMES B. BECK of Kentucky managers at the same on its part.

TAX AND TARIFF BILL.

The Senate proceeded to consider the action of the House of Representatives on its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 3572) to amend existing customs and internal-revenue laws, and for other purposes.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist on its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. MORRILL of Vermont, and Mr. BAYARD.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WEST. I now submit the report of the committee of conference on the post-office appropriation bill.

The Chief Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 3094) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 13 and 15.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments numbered 2 and 5, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the sixth amendment, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the words "library of the office of the Assistant Attorney-General," and insert in lieu thereof the word "use;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House to the eighth amendment, and agree to the same with amendments as follows: In line 1 of said Senate amendment after "on" insert "and after the 1st day of January, 1875;" strike out all after "provided" in line 7, and insert "that nothing in this act shall be held to change or amend section 99 of the act entitled 'An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to the Post-Office Department,' approved June 8, 1872;" and in section 6, line 1, after "that" insert the words "on and after the 1st day of January, 1875;" and the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House to the twelfth amendment, and agree to the same with amendments as follows: In the second amendment of the House to said Senate amendment strike out "taken" and insert "made;" in line 31 of said Senate amendment strike out "one;" and the House agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the fourteenth amendment, and agree to the same with amendments as follows: In line 9 strike out "eight" and insert "six;" in line 33 strike out "eight" and insert "six;" in line 67 strike out "fifty" and insert "sixty;" in line 68 strike out "forty" and insert "fifty;" in line 69 strike out "thirty" and insert "forty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the sixteenth amendment, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 87 strike out the words "a letting under advertisement can take place" and insert in lieu thereof "the service shall have commenced under a contract made according to law;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the seventeenth amendment, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Insert in lieu of said amendment the following:

That hereafter the postage on public documents mailed by any member of Congress, the President, or head of any Executive Department, shall be ten cents for each bound volume, and on unbound documents the same rate as that on newspapers mailed from a known office of publication to regular subscribers, and the word "Public documents" written or printed thereon or on the wrapper thereof, and certified by the signature of any member of Congress, or by that of the President, or head of any Executive Department, shall be deemed a sufficient certificate that the same is a public document; and the term "public document" is hereby defined to be all publications printed by order of Congress, or either House thereof.

And the Senate agree to the same.

J. R. WEST,
ALEX. RAMSEY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JAS. N. TYNER,
S. S. MARSHALL,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SHERMAN. I regret very much that I was not able to agree to the report of the committee of conference on account of the very large reduction it makes in the rate of postage on newspapers. It is reduced by this bill to one-half the present rate. The present rate of postage on newspapers is 20 cents per annum on a weekly paper. These papers weigh about 2 ounces, so that 52 papers weighing 104 ounces are now carried through the mails at 20 cents or a trifle over 3 cents a pound. This bill reduces the postage on newspapers to 1½ cents a pound, or $30 a ton, to be distributed all over the United States. In other words, it is a reduction in the rate of postage on newspapers to one-half. The postage on periodicals is by a somewhat different scale; the precise rate I am not able to state, but no doubt the Senator from Louisiana can tell.

Mr. WEST. Three cents.

Mr. SHERMAN. I mean the old rate on periodicals and large magazines.

Mr. WEST. The same, three cents.

Mr. SHERMAN. The proposition now is to fix the rate of postage at 1½ cents a pound on newspapers and at 3 cents a pound on periodicals. On both the reduction is about one-half. To reduce the rate of postage on newspapers at this time, when we are looking around for new sources of revenue, when our expenses are coming close to our receipts, seems to me a most unwise mersure, improvident, and unjustifiable in every sense of the term. I cannot therefore consent to it.

In the amendment sent to the House the Senate proposed a rate of postage of 4 cents a pound on all newspapers and periodicals alike, whichwas perhaps a very slight advance on the present rate, but it was a uniform rate and therefore much preferablerate either to the House or the rate now in force. The present rate does not depend upon the size or weight of the paper but is equal to from 3 to 4 cents a pound; therefore the proposed rate of 4 cents a pound prepaid would be a slight advance on the existing rate of postage. I would have agreed with great pleasure to a uniform rate of 3 cents a pound on books, newspapers, and periodicals; for it was not the purpose of the Senate to either increase or diminish the rate, but only to substitute a specific uniform rate to be prepaid like all other postage.

Perhaps Senators have not all of them been familiar with the question of the rate of postage. If you compare the rate of postage on newspapers with letters, the comparison is very striking indeed. We now charge for letters at the rate of 96 cents a pound. For a half-ounce of letter matter we charge 3 cents. So that the rate proposed on newspapers is one-sixtieth of the rate of letter postage. The old rate was about one-thirtieth part. Another thing: the total revenues of the Postal Department are now $23,000,000 a year. The revenue collected from newspapers is $1,000,000 or less; the postage on letters $22,000,000; so that out of the whole mass of our revenue for postage only one-twenty-third is furnished from printed matter, while the printed matter is 80 per cent. of the whole mail matter.

Mr. WEST. Not the newspaper matter.

Mr. SHERMAN. The printed matter.

Mr. WEST. Printed matter and matter of the third class, including all seeds and merchandise, which is quite a large percentage, amounts to that.

Mr. SHERMAN. Even newspaper matter is something over 80 per cent. I wish Senators to bear in mind that the present weight of newspapers alone going through the mail is four-fifths of the entire mail in weight, so that if you divide the expenditures of the Postal Department, now amounting to twenty-nine millions, in proportion to the weight between letter and printed matter, the printed matter including newspapers ought to pay $26,000,000 and the written matter ought to pay $3,000,000, while the actual fact now is that the letter matter pays twenty-two millions and the printed matter pays less than a million, so gross is the present discrimination in favor of newspapers. Indeed the amount collected on newspapers does not pay for the mere expense of delivering them. It does not pay one-fourth of the expense of the railroad transportation. It does not pay one-seventh of the expense of the postmasters of the country alone. It is so gross, so disproportionate as finally to have excited the attention of the country. To correct that the Senate proposed slightly to increase the rate of postage on newspapers and also to require it to be prepaid.

Not only are the newspapers carried at this grossly disproportionate rate to the letter mail, but they have always had heretofore the franking privilege in the most offensive form; that is, newspapers are carried without prepayment, the postage to be collected at the other end of the line. Every publisher of a newspaper could frank the whole edition of his newspaper without paying a cent of postage, the postage being supposed to be collected at the other end of the line.

Mr. WEST. Generally it was not collected.

Mr. SHERMAN. That was a privilege granted only to the publishers of newspapers. Any private citizen who sent any newspaper or book or other printed matter had to prepay the postage at a much larger rate, and anybody, however poor, however difficult it might be for him to find the means for doing it, was compelled always to prepay the postage on either written or printed matter at a largely increased rate, while the newspaper publishers sent their mail matter practically free, or to be collected at the other end of the line. The result was that while the postage on newspapers should have been $2,700,000, the whole amount received by the Government of the United States was only about $340,000. Two-thirds of the actual postage levied by law upon newspapers never gets into the revenues of the General Government, but is either wasted by the failure to collect it or the failure of postmasters to return the amounts collected. Therefore it has been proposed to adopt a system of prepayment of postages, which is the rule as to all other postal matter in every other country that I know of.

It has thus far been found impossible to secure a system of prepayment of postage, and now this simple measure of equity and justice is opposed unless the rate of postage be enormously reduced. I was not prepared for one, and am not now, to vote for a reduction of newspaper postage so gross as this, while at the present rates the postage on written matter is thirty times as great as it is on printed matter, and while the printed matter now only yields to us $1,000,000 of revenue to $22,000,000 collected on letters, though the actual cost of carrying that mail matter is at least $14,000,000. If you make due allowances for the difference between printed and written matter and count the whole mass of printed matter as only costing as much as the whole mass of written matter, the cost of carrying newspapers and pamphlets through the mails would be $14,000,000. In truth and in fact the mass of written matter does not cost as much to transport it as the whole mass of printed matter. We know it does not cost one-fourth as much, because it only bears the relation in weight of 1 to 10.

Under these circumstances it seemed to me but right and just that the postage on newspapers should be prepaid without a reduction of the rate. The publishers ought to be willing to accede to that. They should pay some small proportion of the expense to the United States of carrying their printed matter through the mail. When I offered the proposition the other day in the Senate to make a uniform rate of 4 cents a pound on newspapers I did not dream that I was exciting such indignation of interested parties or treating of a very delicate question. We had been in the habit of levying taxes on the people, fixing rates of postage, dealing with great questions affecting the rights and interests of the whole people, and no complaint was made. The people sustained us if we did about what was right. But the very moment the proposition was made to make the newspapers pay one-fifth part of the actual cost of carrying their merchandise through the mails, that moment a great clamor was made.

When I submitted that proposition I had no conception that my motives would be impugned; that I would be charged with doing this thing out of spite or to punish some one; or that all at once I was to be assailed and arraigned by telegraph and press as guilty of some high crime or misdemeanor. Sir, all this is sheer folly. I may have made a mistake, but I think not, and am not likely to be deterred from doing a plain duty by any kind of clamor. It was with me a purely revenue question, the measure being proposed in the hope to derive some little more revenue from carrying printed matter through the mail, so that it should be required at least to pay about one-fifth of the cost of carrying it. But it seems the House of Representatives took a different view and thought the rate was too high, and insist upon a rate of 1½ cents a pound.

England has adopted a cheap-postage system and was the first to adopt it. They charge 1*d.*, or 2 of our cents, for carrying a letter; they charge ½*d.*, or 1 cent, for carrying a newspaper. They charge one-half as much for carrying a newspaper as they do for carrying a letter, while under the operations of this bill the charge for carrying a newspaper through the mail, if sent from the office of publication, is only one-fifth of one cent, though weighing two ounces; while if you carry a letter it is three cents, though weighing but half an ounce. This discrimination in favor of newspapers it seems to me is enormous and unjust.

Mr. RAMSEY. The Senator should recollect that England formerly had a stamp duty on newspapers and no postage at all. They have now abolished the stamp duty and in lieu of it put on the postage rate.

Mr. SHERMAN. Every newspaper that goes through the mails, the London Times and every other newspaper in England, has to pay one half penny.

Mr. RAMSEY. I admit that; but that is in lieu of the stamp duty theretofore imposed.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is for postage.

Mr. RAMSEY. It is a revenue in lieu of the stamp duty which they abolished. That is one reason it is so high there.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well; but the postage on newspapers there is ½*d.* or 1 cent, while we propose to reduce it down to ⅛ of a cent, while we leave letter postage at 3 cents.

Under the proposed rates the difference between letter postage and newspaper postage is so enormous as to naturally excite attention. As I said before, when I first made this proposition and it was voted unanimously by the Senate there was no talk here but that it was a simple, pure revenue measure; and yet the very next morning brought back to us accounts in the newspapers that the Senate, especially Senator SHERMAN, out of spite, had been striking at the newspapers! Mr. President, I have no quarrel with the newspapers. The great body of the newspapers have always treated me, so far as I know, with great kindness; and if any of them have treated me unkindly or unfairly, generally other newspapers took a different view and came to my relief. I have no quarrel with the newspapers. My whole effort in this matter has been simply to impose a reasonable rate of postage on newspapers in view of the present condition of the country. The idea now in our present condition, when we are levying new taxes, when we are compelled to cut down all branches of our service, reducing our expenses in all Departments—the idea that now we should repeal one-half the rate of postage on newspapers, which now do not pay more than one-fifth the cost of transporting them, it seems to me is trifling with a great subject and it ought not to be yielded, and I for one will not do it.

Mr. President, a great deal of comment has been made upon the proposition of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] to carry a public document through the mails at 25 cents. With some hesitation we put the minimum charge on public documents at 25 cents. We made an inquiry and we found that a public document, on the average, weighed 2 pounds; so that the rate proposed by the Senator from New Jersey was 12½ cents per pound; that is, we were required to pay, or anybody who received a document from us was required to pay, postage at the rate of 12½ cents per pound; and yet in that same bill it is proposed to charge newspapers only at the rate of 1½ cents per pound, or at the rate of 3 cents for newspaper matter equal to a public document. In this report the committee have reduced the rate of postage on public documents to 10 cents and require us to prepay it. A document published at public expense at the Public Printing Office, before it can be sent by us to our constituents, must, under this report, be prepaid at the rate of 10 cents, or 5 cents a pound. Even this rate I regarded too low, and yet now it is proposed to carry newspapers by the pound at 1½ cents; and I am arraigned for proposing to charge 4 cents a pound, or about one-fifth of the actual cost of the service to the United States.

Mr. WEST. Is the Senator exactly stating the case fairly? A newspaper is not a bound book. We are to pay on public documents that are bound 10 cents per document; that is, 5 cents per pound; but the Senator knows very well that there is a provision in this report that if the documents are unbound they shall only pay the same rate as newspapers.

Mr. SHERMAN. When you pay by weight, what is the difference between bound or unbound documents? Printed matter sent from any printing office in this country can be carried from San Francisco to New York or vice versa at $30 a ton, or 1½ cents a pound less than the cheapest freight by rail between these points; and yet if that same information is put in the form of a public document sent by us, the postage, to be prepaid by us, costs 5 cents a pound. Sir, you might as well abandon all postage on newspapers. If there is not courage enough in Congress to deal with this question of a fair rate of postage on newspapers, I would far rather carry in the mails newspapers free than pretend to collect at the rate of 1½ cents per pound, which is totally inadequate. If we dare not provide for a reasonable rate let us make the newspapers free at once. If it is necessary for the United States to distribute newspapers to disseminate information among the people, why charge anything? Why put the publishers to the trouble to weigh their merchandise unless you mean to charge them a reasonable rate for the service you do them?

Again, sir, why discriminate against pamphlets? The pamphlets are the selected literature of the day, the winnowings of the chaff. They are charged by this bill at the rate of 3 cents per pound. Why this discrimination? Why discriminate against pamphlets and in favor of newspapers? Is there any reason for it? If your object is to disseminate information, then pamphlets are a much better form of current intelligence and should be favored rather than charged double; and yet here is a discrimination of one-half.

It seems to me this whole proposition is based upon the idea that we must carry the mail for the benefit of the newspapers. It has been said that if we make the rates too high the newspapers will be carried by the express companies. Why, sir, to the extent that express companies carry newspapers it is a relief to the Treasury. Our Post-Office Department would be more than self-sustaining if three-fourths of the newspapers were carried by express companies. The only reason why we have a deficiency, increasing year by year until now it amounts to $8,000,000, is because we carry the newspapers through the mails without charge or with an insufficient charge. If there was a reasonable charge put upon newspapers our Post-Office Department would be self-sustaining. If we put on newspapers one-half of the rate levied in England the Department would be self-sustaining. The real secret of the deficiency in our postal revenue is that we make no charge on newspapers worth naming; that is, we carry nine-tenths of the mail for $1,000,000, while the carrying of the whole mail costs us $29,000,000. Is this right? Have we no power to correct it?

Complaint was made that in my proposition to the Senate the other day the time for the taking effect of this amendment was not fixed. It was fixed. That was a misrepresentation. In the very amendment I offered it was fixed for the 1st of January next. I handed the proposition to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. RAMSEY] to offer it, and he did offer it.

Now, Mr. President, it does seem to me the Senate of the United States, under the present circumstances, might very properly recommit this report and levy a uniform rate on all printed matter of about 3 cents a pound. In the proposition adopted by the Senate we put it at 4 cents a pound, because that was slightly in advance of the present rate, but only a mere fraction; but if the rate was fixed at 3 cents a pound, the newspapers and printed matter would yield a revenue of from three to four millions and to some extent make good the deficiency in the postal service.

To show you that the public press have not annually concurred in the clamor made about this amendment, I desire to say I have received both telegrams and letters from intelligent publishers in this country who not only do not complain, but say this is right, and if the public are to pass on this question, they will say it is right. There is no good reason why the commodities of newspapers should be carried through the mails unless they pay some proportion of the cost. I am happy to say I have here a letter from a very respectable member of the press, the publisher of a well-known weekly newspaper. In speaking of the rate proposed in the House bill, 1½ cents, he says:

> Your rate of 4 cents is far better, and that will bring country papers down as follows: oz. 1½ × 52 × 4 cents—19½ cents—for an average paper of an ounce and a half.

That is, 52, the number of issues in a year, multiplied by 1½, the number of ounces, gives 78 ounces, or less than 5 pounds; which at 4 cents a pound makes 19½ cents. That is the cost of postage of a weekly paper for a year weighing 1½ ounces, which is the ordinary weight, at the rate of 4 cents, while under the present law it is 20 cents. The present law makes the rate of postage on country papers a little higher than 4 cents on an ordinary weekly paper; but when you take the great weekly papers published in the metropolitan cities, they weigh more, and consequently the present rate upon them is only about 3 cents a pound. Taking the average country weekly papers published in cities of twenty thousand inhabitants and less, the present rate is 4 cents a pound.

Then he goes on:

> As an illustration, my own paper is printed on paper that weighs 40 pounds to the ream, and while it is now being run through the press I find that 11 damp sheets weigh a pound. This brings the postage on my paper, which is 27 by 38 inches, on 40-pound paper, at 4 cents per week, to 19 cents a year, and my paper is above the average. Now, even including wrappers, your rate will really bring the average on country papers below the present rate of 20 cents a year. This ought to be more generally known.

Now, Mr. President, why should not this be done? Why should not the newspapers be willing to bear some portion of the expense of transporting their product through the mails? Remember this is not a tax upon newspapers. We are not now levying a tax on newspapers. There is no tax whatever levied on a newspaper. They pay no tax to the General Government, and we do not charge them even now more than one-tenth of the actual cost of transporting their commodities, and this report proposes to reduce that one-tenth down to one-twentieth, and all because we require them to prepay their mail matter!

Sir, publishers of newspapers are like all other men. They are governed in the main by their interests. They are generally honorable men, engaged in an honorable calling. I have not one word to say against the public press. I believe the public press of our day and generation is stronger, better, and purer than it has been in former times, although it is still subject to great abuses. The public press is a great power in this country. No public man would seek to engage in a contest with them. The danger is not that we would do anything to spite them, but the danger is that in fear of their power we will not do our duty to the country.

Now, sir, when the newspaper press were called upon to prepay their postage they complained a great deal about it; but public sentiment had gradually so developed itself that it was felt to be the fixed law that they had to prepay their postage like other people who use the public mail. The Postmaster-General has for years requested us to pass a law requiring newspaper postage to be prepaid, and public opinion has so developed itself that finally the publishers of the country have been compelled to yield to that public sentiment; but while yielding they demanded a reduction in the rate of postage. Why so? Why should the amount of postage, now totally inadequate, be reduced? No good reason can be given for it.

Why, sir, if this question is looked upon as it affects the public at large, there is no reason why the newspaper press should not pay the whole cost of carrying their mail matter. The general distribution and dissemination of newspapers throughout the country is undoubtedly useful; no man would desire to interfere with that; but is it unjust to charge them but one-fifth of the cost of the labor done for them?

I hope, therefore, although these are the last hours of the session, the Senate will pause and consider well before they make this large reduction in the rate of postage. Let us at least seek another conference with the House of Representatives on the subject. I believe a uniform rate of 3 cents a pound on all printed matter, pamphlets, newspapers, and periodicals would yield a considerable revenue, would not increase the present rate of postage, and would be of vast service to the country. The newspapers might complain a while, but I hope we all dare to do our duty whether complaints come from one quarter or another. I at least shall not vote to concur in this conference report.

Mr. WEST. The very little attention that the Senate has given to the Senator who has just spoken would hardly encourage me to think I can command its attention; but I do not think the Senate ought to be asked by a committee of conference to vote for a proposition that they have seen proper to submit, when it is contested by one member of that committee without its being supported by the other members.

The Senator from Ohio admitted away his whole case very early in his argument. He said you could not secure the prepayment of this postage unless you reduced the rate. That is the Senator's proposition. He stated it distinctly. That is the experience of all postal service, and the Senator has stated it correctly. What is his proposition? His proposition is to raise the rate and to insist on prepayment. The rate now is three cents. The Senator's proposition is to make it four cents and insist on prepayment. The committee wanted prepayment, and in order to get that prepayment we had to reduce the rate, but we did not reduce it, as the Senator says, from four to one and a half cents uniformly on all newspapers. Read the recommendation of the committee as it is presented here. One and a half cents on all newspapers published as often as once a week, and three cents on all published less frequently than once a week. That is the proposition; so that the great bulk of your newspapers throughout the country are charged three cents.

Mr. SHERMAN. All the daily papers one and a half cents.

Mr. WEST. I admit that; but take the majority of publications in this country, and you will find the majority of them are in the other class.

Mr. SHERMAN. I assure the Senator he is mistaken. Ninety-nine one-hundredths of the newspapers are published at least as often as once a week.

Mr. WEST. I do not think I am mistaken. There are a great many semi-monthlies and a great many monthlies and periodicals.

Mr. SHERMAN. Periodicals are but a small proportion compared with the daily and weekly papers.

Mr. WEST. Very well. Now, the Senator says there is a fallacy in reducing the rates of postage when we are requiring prepayment of postage. The fallacy is simply this: by insisting on prepayment we recover what the Government does not get. The total postage on all newspaper matter now throughout the country is $3,000,000; only $1,000,000 of it goes into the Treasury. By the prepayment proposition you will get more, and a good deal more, of it.

Mr. SHERMAN. According to what my friend says we shall get a million and a half, and the newspapers will save a million and a half.

Mr. WEST. I never heard such a proposition coming from the chairman of the Committee on Finance, that by the imposition of duty on an article, that duty came out of the importer. That is the Senator's proposition here, that by imposing a duty on newspapers, requiring prepaid postage on them, it comes out of the newspapers. It comes out of the people who pay the postage on the newspapers, just as much as the tariff on sugar comes out of the man who consumes it.

Mr. SHERMAN. The people pay now $2,700,000 for postage excepting what is not collected, and the postmasters get some of it. The Government gets but $900,000.

Mr. RAMSEY. Over a million last year.

Mr. WEST. The Senator complains that the newspapers carried throughout this country only pay $3,000,000. His proposition is to make them pay four millions. The great discrepancy between the cost of newspaper mail and post-office mail he only proposes to encroach upon to the extent of $1,000,000; whereas we contend that under this reduced rate of postage we shall collect more than three out of four cents, and the Post-Office Department is of that opinion. Why? Because if you compel them to pay four cents, they will resort to express companies on short hauls, where we would gain an advantage at one and a half, and throw on the Department the whole weight of their long hauls away into Oregon and California. That is the difference.

But, sir, I am convinced that the Senate is disposed to stand by the report of the committee. It is made in accordance with the views of the Post-Office Department, and is also made in accordance with the views of the House of Representatives, the body most recently coming from the people; and I do not think it worth while to detain the Senate any longer on the subject.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I am very sorry not to be able to concur in the action of the committee of conference on this bill; but there are certain principles I think so clearly to be observed in matters of this kind, that I cannot see my way clear to do it. This is a reduction of the postage heretofore paid on newspapers.

Mr. WEST. A reduction of one-half on what was assessed and not collected.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It is a reduction of one-half of the postage heretofore charged upon newspapers. Can anybody answer to himself or the country or anybody else why that should be done now? Has anybody stated any reason why that reduction should be made? When the expenses of this Department are increasing so largely, when your revenues are running behind $30,000,000, and you will have on the day when this fiscal year goes out $30,000,000 of deficiency, is this a good time to do that? Is it the patriotic sense of the newspaper press of this country that it is a good thing to do, to relieve themselves at this time of one-half the burden which should fall equitably and honestly and fairly upon them in the transaction of their business on rates which were always very low, and that this is the time to do that thing? Does my honorable friend from Minnesota [Mr. RAMSEY] who has charge, so far as the Senate is concerned, of the Post-Office Department, think he is to sustain the credit of that Department by allowing such a thing as this to be done at this time?

Sir, what is this service? From the beginning we have levied a tax on this service, for its support chiefly; and now you propose to relieve that part of the service which contributes more than eighty hundredths part of the entire burden, so that what it contributes will be merely nominal. My honorable friend from Minnesota, the chairman of that committee, tells you that we only collected $1,072,000 from the newspaper press of the country as the rate stood before, and now you reduce it one-half.

Mr. President, the newspaper press of this country cannot afford to accept any such proposition as that. While you are putting $22,000,000 upon the people of this country who pay letter-postage it is a public indecency to say that you will only collect less than $1,000,000 upon that service which contributes more than eighty hundredths of the entire burden. I am amazed that the House of Representatives, if it is true, as my honorable friend who has charge of this bill represents, should insist upon any such thing at the present time; and it seems to me the Senate of the United States will be wanting in ordinary self-respect to allow any such thing as that to be done under any circumstances that I can conceive of.

What earthly reason is there for it? The newspaper press of the country do not appeal to anybody for this that I know of. They have not asked it; and I have too exalted an opinion of the newspaper press of this country to believe that they desire any such thing as this. Do the newspaper press of this country want their papers to go through the mails free? Are they willing to impose a burden upon the people of this country and to allow a deficiency of many millions to be paid out of the Treasury that their papers may go free? I do not believe any such thing. I have seen no newspaper anywhere that asked any such thing. I am sure there has been no representative here in their behalf that they desired any such thing.

Reluctant as I am, Mr. President, to postpone or delay the business of the session, I should regret extremely that the Senate of the United States should allow itself to do any such thing as is proposed by the adoption of this conference report.

Mr. RAMSEY. I am surprised at the course of the honorable Senator from Maine, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. It is notorious that in all time it has been impossible to collect the postage upon newspapers, no matter how high the charge was. In your policy pursued in general commerce you very often reduce your duties for the purpose of breaking down smuggling and really getting a revenue from an article. So you should do in this case. Notwithstanding every effort has been made the Government has only received for the transportation of the immense mass of newspapers published in this country $900,000, and finally last year it rose to $1,072,000. The true policy of the administration of the Post-Office Department is to insist upon prepayment in every possible instance, even although you do reduce your postages. Now, with the certainty of making out of this reduced postage by insisting on prepayment $3,000,000, which is the estimate of the Post-Office Department, I think the Senate ought not to hesitate to accept this new rule as established by the report of the committee of conference, yielding to the determined position of the House of Representatives on the subject.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. O, the House of Representatives! What has that to do with the duty of the Senate?

Mr. RAMSEY. The great thing is to secure prepayment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. My honorable friend expresses some surprise that I should oppose this proposition, and says I know or ought to know that the Department have only been able to collect from seven hundred thousand to one million dollars out of the two and a half millions which they ought to have had from newspaper postage. I should like to know how long my honorable friend has known that, and I should like to know how long he has delayed to perform his duty to see that some method had been proposed here by which that evil could have been remedied.

Mr. RAMSEY. Prepayment is the remedy.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Why has it not been done, if the honorable Senator is aware of the fact?

Mr. RAMSEY. "Better late than never."

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. So it is; but it does not follow because there has been laches or neglect somewhere in that particular, that we are to take off one-half the tax on that amount. Who has asked it? The newspaper press has not asked it. Nobody has asked it. If it is a boon proffered to these people, it is a very cheap performance in my judgment. You will get no thanks for it. Nobody wants it. The newspapers of this country do not want to be forced through the mails free. They cannot afford to have it done, nor can the people of this country afford to allow it to be done, in my judgment.

Mr. President, there is no apology under heaven for such a proposition as this while the people of this country are borne down by taxes, while your revenues are running short, while everybody knows now that you are trying to eke them out by a proposition reported here by my honorable friend from Ohio, which I will not characterize as I believe it ought to be, eking out at the rate of $2,000,000 taxes when we know that we are running behind $10,000,000, and making no effort to increase the taxes at all adequate to our demands, and then in this style cutting down the sources of your revenue when nobody asks it. For one I protest against it.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I should like to put a question to the Senator. Does he not consider it is a gain to establish the principle or policy of prepayment on papers as well as letters? We have already established that upon letters. Would it not be a gain on newspapers?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Undoubtedly it would be a gain; but is that a question to be compromised? Are we so impotent, are we so weak, are we so far gone, that we cannot lay an honest tax on any interest in this country without asking the parties who are taxed? Can we not say that the tax which they have been paying and which is small, which is only about one-fifth of the amount put upon the poor men of this country, shall be prepaid without being humiliated by the idea that we have got to compromise that question? I would abandon the whole of it before I would agree to that.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I have one more question to put. The Senator has responded that it would be a gain to that extent; it would be an advantage to change the system on newspapers and make it agree with the system on letters. Now, I put another and a practical question to the Senator: I ask him if it would not be far better to adopt a system that collects all its postage rather than assess a postage which is not collected?

As stated by the Department, the present rate assessed, when collected at the point of delivery, falls far short of the amount now proposed to be assessed by prepayment. I ask the Senator, and repeat my question as a practical one, is it not far better when we have a system of prepayment to arrive at an amount that we know is definite; and then if we find there is a large deficiency we can regulate that hereafter?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The same spirit which yields this now will yield it forever. That is my answer to all that. Nobody has suggested any necessity for it. It is just as easy to put the tax at three cents, where it was before, as it is to put it at one and a half cents. It is optional with Congress. Nothing on earth stands in the way of it.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. The difficulty has been this: the Postmaster-General in his estimates in presenting his claims to Congress for appropriations has predicated them on the collection of postage at the point of delivery; and it has not been until the close of the fiscal year that the deficit has become apparent. Now, I say as a practical question it is far better that we should adopt a system that speaks for itself upon its face so that when the Postmaster-General makes his report here he may know what he will get, not what he expects, but what really he does get. So the adoption of the proposition now before the Senate is coming back to the better policy of providing for prepayment; and if, as has been said, it shall be found that the rate is too low we can hereafter fix it, because then it is determinate and we know just where we stand.

The great difficulty is that a year ahead we expect we are to derive a certain revenue, and at the close of the year we find we have not received what we supposed was our due. In other words, your postmasters in the little offices are compelled by force of circumstances to donate this postage, and even pay it sometimes out of their own pockets rather than be troubled with these little driblets. Any man who has observed this process of collecting in small amounts the quarter's postage on newspapers must know that the postmasters are driven either to ignore their duty or to pay it themselves. It is far easier to roll the responsibility on the Government than to take it out of their pockets on a mere salary of twelve dollars per annum sometimes.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, I know that the Senate is impatient on this subject, but I think one proposition has been broadly and unwarrantably asserted by the Senators who oppose the adoption of this report that ought not to go without refutation; and that is that this yielding of the rate is in response to the demand of the newspapers. The Senators could with the same propriety say that a reduction of the tariff on any imported article was a yielding to the threats or the menaces of the importers.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have disclaimed that I have said distinctly that I heard no desire on their part for it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Allow me to state that when I submitted the proposition I did not believe that the large papers of the country would oppose it. I thought their sense of justice would see the propriety of it.

Mr. WEST. Then it is intimated that we are reducing the tax on newspapers, and that that is the motive of the committee. Now, sir, it must be self-evident to any man who knows anything about it that the postage is not to be paid by the newspapers. The postage is going to come out of the public. There is where all postage comes from. We are trying this experiment whether we cannot collect more postage out of the public by this process than by the one in vogue.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, there is another feature of the report as I heard it read at the table that has thus far elicited no comment; it is the last section incorporated by the conference committee, and which provides, if I apprehend it aright, that each public document, without reference to its weight, shall be carried in the mail at ten cents.

Mr. RAMSEY. Prepaid.

Mr. SCOTT. Prepaid, provided it be franked with the name of the President, the head of a Department, or the member of Congress certifying it is a public document, and that frank makes it presumptive evidence that it is a public document.

Now, Mr. President, that is a feature which I think is a little more reprehensible than any one we have had yet proposed on this bill, either in the Senate or in the House. I suppose the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of this session will make up about six or seven volumes of the ordinary size, and each volume will weigh from three to five pounds; so that that work will go through the mail at ten cents a volume. The Smithsonian Report will go for ten cents; the Agricultural Report for ten cents; Raymond's report for ten cents; these three books, all together not weighing as much as one volume of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. That is the equality in postage which is introduced by this bill, and that is a restoration of the franking privilege by moieties and driblets in that form.

I have heretofore said that I should vote for no kind of insidious approaches toward the restoration of the franking privilege. I will not agree to get back to it by sapping and mining, for the purpose of reaching it, like a mole. If we want it, come out in the daylight and say so; restore it pure and simple, and not impose this inequality of burdens. If there is a man willing to take the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and at the other end of the line pay for it let him pay the freight that is necessary to carry it through the mails. Upon many of the lines the transportation of the postal cars is charged for by weight, and thus we shall have on some of the lines public documents carried, charged for by weight by railroad companies, and parties receiving them at less than is charged for carrying them. That is a feature of this report for which, it seems to me, it should be sent back if there were no other in it.

Mr. RAMSEY. The Senator ought to recollect that a conference is a negotiation of two parties. We cannot get everything that we desire. The Senator probably has never been on a committee of conference where he got all he desired. In return for this the House abandoned the objectionable feature as we thought of passing about three or four hundred thousand volumes of the Agricultural Report entirely free through the mails. It may be increased to a million hereafter. They abandoned that. We got the principle conceded of prepayment. You had yourselves allowed documents to pass without prepayment, the postage to be paid at the other end of the line, and you would never have got that money, as you have failed to get your money on newspapers. We then insisted on the principle of prepayment. We got them to abandon sending through the mails an immense mass of matter for nothing, and we got something in return.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. EDMUNDS in the chair.) The question is on agreeing to the report of the conference committee.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 17, noes 16; no quorum voting.

Mr. WEST. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HOWE, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. MCCREERY.] If present he would vote for agreeing to this report and I should vote against it.

The result was announced—yeas 19, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Boutwell, Carpenter, Clayton, Conover, Cooper, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Ingalls, Jones, Kelly, Logan, Morrill of Vermont, Ramsey, Sargent, Tipton, and West—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Davis, Edmunds, Gordon, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Merrimon, Morrill of Maine, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Pratt, Ransom, Robertson, Scott, Sherman, Sprague, Stevenson, Stockton, and Wright—21.

ABSENT—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bogy, Boreman, Brownlow, Buckingham, Cameron, Chandler, Conkling, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Fenton, Ferry of Connecticut, Gilbert, Hager, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Johnston, Lewis, McCreery, Mitchell, Morton, Saulsbury, Schurz, Spencer, Stewart, Thurman, Wadleigh, Washburn, and Windom—33.

So the report was non-concurred in.

Mr. RAMSEY. Now I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the post-route bill again.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move that a further committee be asked for on the post-office appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate further insist on its amendments and on its disagreements to the amendments of the House of Representatives, and request another conference on the subject of this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the committee; and Messrs. WINDOM, ALLISON, and DAVIS were appointed conferees on the part of the Senate.

THE GENEVA AWARD—RECESS.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I rise to make a report from the committee of conference on the Geneva award bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey presents a report which will be read.

The Chief Clerk commenced to read the report.

Mr. PATTERSON. I move that the Senate take a recess until eight o'clock.

Mr. STEVENSON. I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina moves that the Senate take a recess until eight o'clock, and the Senator from Kentucky rises to a question of order.

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes, sir; to know why the Clerk is reading that report—whether it has been taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk is reading the report presented by the Senator from New Jersey from the committee of conference on the bill, pending which the Senator from South Carolina moves to take a recess till eight o'clock. The question is on the motion of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. STEVENSON. Before that question is put, I still have not the point of order I raised answered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair cannot entertain the question of order at this time because it is not before the Senate. The question is on the motion of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. STEVENSON. I ask the Senator to withdraw the motion for a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. DAVIS. Is it in order to move seven o'clock instead of eight?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is in order by the special rule of the Senate to move to take a recess at any time.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator from South Carolina moves to take a recess till eight o'clock. I think that is too long.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. DAVIS. Can I not move to amend the motion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator can move to amend the motion.

Mr. DAVIS. At the suggestion of Senators, I move to amend by saying "half past seven."

Mr. PATTERSON. I accept the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion as amended to take a recess until half past seven o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 33, noes 14; and the Senate (at five o'clock and forty-six minutes p. m.) took a recess until half past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at half past seven o'clock p. m.

CLERKS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. ANTHONY. I offer the following resolution, which is customary at this stage of the session:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay the salaries of the clerks of committees up to and including the 10th of July.

The resolution was agreed to.

ARKANSAS VALLEY RAILWAY.

Mr. SCHURZ. I would ask unanimous consent to call up a bill which is of great importance to the western interests, being House bill No. 2884.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will let the regular order be waived for a moment.

By unanimous consent, the bill (H. R. No. 2884) granting the right of way through the public lands to the Arkansas Valley Railway Company was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill grants the right of way through the public lands to the Arkansas Valley Railway Company, a corporation duly created under the laws of the Territory of Colorado, its successors and assigns, for a railroad and telegraph line, now partially completed and in operation from a point on the line of the Kansas Pacific Railway at Kit Carson; thence southward to West Las Animas; thence westward along or near the Arkansas River to Pueblo, a distance of about one hundred and fifty miles, and within said Territory of Colorado, to the extent of one hundred feet in width on each side of the railroad where it may pass through the public domain and military reservation at Fort Lyon, including grounds for station-buildings, work-shops, depots, machine-shops, switches, side-tracks, turn-tables, cattle-yards, and water-stations, to the amount not exceeding ten acres, not mineral-lands, for each station, and for not more than one station in every ten miles.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there any provision in that bill which limits the time within which this railway shall exercise the right granted?

Mr. SCHURZ. Yes; six months.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have the clause read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That part of the bill will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That within six months from the passage of this act the said Arkansas Valley Railway Company shall file with the Secretary of the Interior a map, to be approved by him, exhibiting the line of the railroad of said company as the same has been located,

Mr. BOGY. The road is built all the way through.

Mr. SCHURZ. I think I can satisfy the Senator from Vermont on that point.

GEORGE HENRY PREBLE.

Mr. HAMLIN. While the gentlemen are looking at that matter I ask to take up a bill which places Commander Preble according to his proper position in the Navy.

By unanimous consent, the bill (H. R. No. 2892) authorizing the President to appoint George Henry Preble, now a captain on the active list of the Navy, to be a commodore, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that that bill be indefinitely postponed, and on the motion I wish to say a word. I have no idea that it will be postponed, but in order to enter my protest, as I do not want to take up time by the taking of the yeas and nays, I make this motion. I have heard something about this case, and believing it to be a jumping of an officer of the Navy when he ought not to be jumped over the heads of others, my only way now is to move that it be indefinitely postponed, so that the Journal shall show so far as I am concerned that I have no hand in the business.

Mr. HAMLIN. Before the question is put I want the attention of the Senate for a moment. This bill has twice met the approval of the Senate. It only restores Commander Preble to the precise position he would be in to-day but for the action of the Secretary of the Navy, and that action has been overruled by a board of inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to postpone the bill indefinitely.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 17, noes 19; no quorum voting.

Mr. EDMUNDS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken resulted—yeas 14, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Cooper, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Gordon, Hitchcock, McCreery, Robertson, Sargent, Spencer, Stevenson, Thurman, Wadleigh, and Wright—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Boreman, Boutwell, Carpenter, Clayton, Davis, Fenton, Flanagan, Hager, Hamlin, Ingalls, Merrimon, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Pratt, Ransom, Schurz, Scott, Sherman, Stockton, Tipton, Washburn, and Windom—23.

ABSENT—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bogy, Brownlow, Buckingham, Cameron, Chandler, Conkling, Conover, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Ferry of Connecticut, Ferry of Michigan, Gilbert, Goldthwaite, Hamilton of Maryland, Hamilton of Texas, Harvey, Howe, Johnston, Jones, Kelly, Lewis, Logan, Mitchell, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Pease, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Sprague, Stewart, and West—36.

So the motion was rejected.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ARKANSAS VALLEY RAILWAY.

Mr. SCHURZ. The objection to the bill (H. R. No. 2884) granting the right of way through the public lands to the Arkansas Valley Railway Company is no longer persisted in, and I ask that it be disposed of.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I merely wish to say that that bill ought to contain a limitation of time in which the company should exercise this right or it should be forfeited; but it is a small matter, and they say the road, is really built so that practically there will be no need of that limitation. Therefore I do not insist upon the point; otherwise I should think it my duty to see that there should be a limitation.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to some and disagreed to other amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3600) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, and agreed to further amend with amendments, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. JAMES A. GARFIELD of Ohio, Mr. EUGENE HALE of Maine, and Mr. WILLIAM E. NIBLACK of Indiana, managers at the same on its part.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 3422) for the relief of Mercy Ann Hall, widow of Captain Charles F. Hall;

A bill (H. R. No. 1767) to change the name of the steamboat Kitty Strang;

A bill (H. R. No. 3211) to change the name of the schooner Delmar;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 114) to fill a vacancy in the board of managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 115) for the relief of certain clerks and employés of the United States.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate proceeded to consider the action of the House of Representatives on its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 3600) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes.

On motion of Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist on its amendments to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, disagree to the amendments of the House to other amendments of the Senate, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the Houses thereon.

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. MORRILL of Maine, Mr. SARGENT, and Mr. STEVENSON.

JOSEPH WILSON.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the Senate proceed to consider the bill (S. No. 926) referring the case of Joseph Wilson to the Court of Claims.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The claim of Joseph Wilson, for compensation for mules captured by the rebels in July, 1864, in consequence of the refusal of the pickets of the Army to allow him to pass within the lines and deliver the mules to the Government on his contract, is by the bill referred to the Court of Claims for its decision according to the law and the practice of that court in such cases and proceedings.

Mr. SCOTT. I deem it my duty to state that that bill did not receive the unanimous indorsement of the Committee on Claims, and I do not think it ought to pass. The party named in the bill had a contract with the Government to deliver mules in the city of Washington. He was endeavoring to fulfill his contract and got his mules near to the city of Washington at the time when Early's raid was made upon the city, and an order was issued prohibiting all persons from coming inside the picket lines. In consequence his mules were detained outside the picket lines, notwithstanding he was ready to deliver them, and they were captured by the enemy. A portion of them were recovered, and this bill proposes to send to the Court of Claims this case for the purpose of permitting him to make a claim against the Government for those that were not recaptured. I do not discover any difference between this man whose property on the way to be delivered to the Government was captured by the enemy and that of any other citizen whose property was captured by the enemy, and therefore I think it my duty to oppose the passage of the bill.

Mr. DAVIS. The bill, as the chairman says, was not unanimously reported, but pretty nearly so. This man had a contract to deliver the mules. If he has no right, the Court of Claims will say so. The bill refers it to the court for decision.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Is the bill before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. HOWE. No; the question is on taking it up.

Mr. SCOTT. That reminds me of another feature in the case. It is a contract; and if the party had desired to bring himself into the Court of Claims he could have done so at any time within six years from the time the contract was made. He did not do so, but preferred to present his case to Congress. I do not think it is one where Congress ought to grant relief.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. As this is going to lead to discussion, I call for the regular order and ask for the reading of the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. DAVIS. I did not know that we had any regular order.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I call for the reading of the report of the committee of conference, which the Senate was engaged in when the recess was taken.

Mr. DAVIS. This will only take a moment. I only ask a vote.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. If we can have a vote immediately I have no objection.

The bill was reported to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall the bill be engrossed for a third reading?

The question being put, there were, on a division—ayes 15, noes 21; no quorum voting.

Mr. STEVENSON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STEVENSON. I wish to say a single word. This man, Wilson, entered into a contract with the Government for the delivery of a certain number of mules at the city of Washington. He took all the risks and got here upon the edge of the city, just upon the line, ready to deliver his mules, and waited there forty-eight hours. In consequence of an order of the provost-marshal he was prevented delivering them. The War Department would have paid him this claim; but he went and fulfilled his contract. He does not ask a dollar from this Congress. All that he asks is permission to go to the Court of Claims and there present his right for an infraction of a covenant which he thinks he has suffered by the act of the Government in regard to the delivery of these mules.

What objection can there be to allowing him to present his claim to the Court of Claims with a right to go to the Supreme Court of the United States? No class of contracts has been more frequently judicially acted on than this; and but three weeks ago the Senate allowed a gentleman to go to the Court of Claims whose claim had been barred by time.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Will the Senator inform us why this claimant did not go to the Court of Claims within six years?

Mr. STEVENSON. I will. Mr. Wilson, who is as reputable a man as my State has, came on the advice of my colleague, now dead, Mr. Garrett Davis, to Congress, and for several years attempted to get his claim through. I believe it passed one House, but I am not certain of that; but I am perfectly certain, because Mr. Davis told me so, that a juster claim never was presented in the world. He labored here for years and attempted to get it through. As we all know, just claims frequently are delayed. He is a farmer; he knew nothing about the statute of limitations or anything about his rights. He relied upon his Senator in good faith and he failed; and now all that he asks is to go to the Court of Claims with an appeal to the Supreme Court, to have it decided whether the Government broke its contract with him. If he has a contract, surely the Senate will not refuse him that privilege.

Mr. BOUTWELL. The case has this aspect: that this claimant did not avail himself of his legal right to go to the Court of Claims under his contract if he had one, or color of contract if there were color of contract, but chose to resort to Congress during the period of six years; and having failed up to this time he now asks Congress to let him go to the Court of Claims. That is, he had the right to go to the Court of Claims during six years; he did not avail himself of it, and now he asks to be put out of the usual condition of citizens of the country. If he had not the color of contract, then the proposition is to give him a standing in the Court of Claims which under the general law of the country he never had.

Mr. STEVENSON. And has it come to this, that a Government like this will put itself upon the technicality of defeating an honest claim because the man is not a lawyer and did not resort to the Court of Claims?

Mr. BOUTWELL. He had representatives.

Mr. STEVENSON. I say to the Senator from Massachusetts—I do not know how he voted on that case—that in the claim from North Carolina of the sons of Stephen A. Douglas they were allowed to go to this court. They had slept on their rights; and yet after the six years had expired the Senator, not more than four weeks ago, notwithstanding that they had been barred by time, passed a bill to allow them to go to the Court of Claims. Now, sir, do not make fish of one and flesh of another.

I know how pressed the Senate is for time, and I do not desire to take a moment. This bill, it seems to me, has a precedent in two or three cases, and the War Department itself, as I was informed, would have sent this claim of its own motion to the Court of Claims but for the fact that after this man had brought his mules here and waited twenty-four hours ready to deliver them, although they were taken from him he went back at his own cost and bought new mules and brought them here and filled his contract; and for that he is to be punished because he made a mistake in coming to Congress when the Senate themselves have allowed similar claims to go before the Court of Claims.

Mr. President, if this man has a just claim, why will Senators deprive him of the right to go to a judicial tribunal? Surely the Supreme Court of the United States acting as the court of last resort are able to say whether this man has been injured and has a right of action against the Government. That is all he asks, and I appeal to Senators as they did it in the case from North Carolina so to do it in this case from my State.

Mr. SCOTT. The reference to another case requires me to say one word more about this case. The case to which the Senator from Kentucky refers, in which the children of Hon. S. A. Douglas were permitted to go to the Court of Claims, was an entirely different case from this. In the first place both of them were minors and were unable to go into the Court of Claims for that reason. They had not capacity to sue in their own right. In the second place, and the controlling reason why they were permitted to go into the Court of Claims by special act, was that another party was claiming before the Court of Claims the same property for which the young Douglases were making a contest, and it became necessary to permit them to go to the Court of Claims so that the relative claims of the contesting parties might be heard upon the evidence before that court. These were the two controlling reasons which entirely distinguish that case from the case that is now before us.

I do not place my opposition to this case going to the Court of Claims upon the fact that the party could have gone during the six years that he might have brought suit upon his contract. I put it upon the broad ground that this is simply asking to go to the Court of Claims for the purpose of recovering compensation for property captured by the rebel army. There is the principle involved. There is no distinction between this property captured by the rebel army and any other property that was captured by them. The fact that he was endeavoring to fulfill his contract in good faith makes no difference. If a farmer in driving his mules from Baltimore to Wilmington had had them captured during that time, we would not think of paying him. This man was in the course of his business fulfilling his contract, and he met with the misfortune of having his property captured and it was not recaptured. There is the broad principle to be settled in this bill: shall we pay for property captured by the enemy? I say we ought not to do so. If I could yield my convictions on this subject for any personal considerations, I would yield them to the Senator from Kentucky; but the principle is too broad and too pernicious to receive the sanction of the Senate without opposition.

Mr. STEVENSON. I deny the fact stated by the Senator that this property was taken by rebels as an act of war. Mr. Wilson was here on the day he agreed to be here. He waited more than a day after he was here, and there is no principle better settled in contracts than that if I make a contract to deliver property personally on a particular day, and the other party does not receive it and by his own act puts it out of my power to deliver it, he is liable to me. While I bow to the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania as a better lawyer than myself, I propose not to say that he is wrong and that I am right, but I ask the Senate as a matter of justice to leave this question to a cool, calm, judicial court, with the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States; and if they decide that the Senator from Pennsylvania is wrong, it seems to me he ought to yield his opinion.

The Senator says that the Douglas claim was different from this. It is the first time I ever heard that infants could not sue. Why could not they sue by their guardian?

Mr. SCOTT. They had none.

Mr. STEVENSON. The Senator says they had none. I do not know whether they had any or not. I know that the administrator of Stephen A. Douglas did come to Congress, did petition Congress, did ask Congress, and did lose his time, as my constituent is losing his in seeking relief. The Senator can see in that case merit. Sir, I would vote for that claim, and I would vote for any claim that I believed to be just and right, without regard to the position or standing of the claimant. Let it not be said that the distinguished name of one man led the Senate to do an act which they are unwilling to do for a hard-working, honest, upright man, who brought his property here under a contract with the Government, who waited twenty-four hours and was then prevented from delivering it by the act of the Government itself, and who now asks not to be paid, but appeals to the Senate and says, "Let me go to the Court of Claims; if I have got a case I will get what I deserve; and if I am not entitled to anything, I will lose the $20,000 that I invested in carrying out my contract." Can it be possible that Congress will say to him, "No; we did it in one case, but we will not do it in yours." Senators, be just. Senators, look to no condition or class of cases.

> Honor and shame from no condition rise,
> Act well your part, there all the honor lies.

This man is an upright, honest, plain farmer, in the county of Bourbon, and he appeals to the Congress of his country to allow him to go to a court to say whether he has a claim or not, and that claim has a precedent hardly dry upon your statute-books; and I ask the Senate as an act of justice to grant this request.

Mr. EDMUNDS. "Acting well your part," so far as the Senator from Kentucky and his political associates are concerned, is to vote every time in favor of any species of claim growing out of the war by citizens south of Mason and Dixon's line. I think I speak by the record when I say that on every vote which has been taken in the Senate since I have been here, for eight years, the part of the Senator from Kentucky during his presence and of all his political associates has been to vote without exception and in solid phalanx, in favor of every claim growing out of the war; certainly in favor of every claim south of the line I name. Of course they do it from patriotic motives; they do it upon principle. We all understand that.

But, Mr. President, when you come to look at this particular case, it is cutting a little fatter. You will find this bill goes a little farther, on the face of the bill, (for the eloquence of the Senator from Kentucky is not put into the enactment,) than any bill that has ever been presented to the Senate. The Milton Best bill and all that class of bills on the face of them profess to be for something that the Union Army has taken for its use in one form or another so as to fall within a principle that we all understand. This bill, on the contrary, puts this man and his property outside of the neutral lines, and therefore in the country of the enemy. It puts him in the attitude of coming from the lines of the enemy, and while coming through the lines of the enemy, and while waiting to undergo the ceremonies which war required us to have with any people coming within our lines from the other side, his property is captured. The bill itself settles the question for the Court of Claims that his capture was "in consequence of the refusal of the pickets of the Army to allow him to pass." He starts in the Court of Claims with our determining that, without knowing anything about it to begin with.

Then it is a claim "for compensation for mules captured by the rebels." It is not for compensation for any act of the Government of the United States in violating a contract, but it is "compensation for mules captured by the rebels in July, 1864, in consequence of the refusal of the pickets of the Army to allow him to pass within the lines, and deliver the mules to the Government on his contract."

Now, I should be glad to know how this man and his mules, before we send this case to the Court of Claims, came through the rebel lines; what information he got there; what information he intended to carry back if he was to return by the same road he came, as I assume he was.

Mr. DAVIS. I will inform the Senator that the mules came from Kentucky, and were driven in from the Union lines, from Baltimore.

Mr. EDMUNDS. From where?

Mr. DAVIS. From Baltimore, in this direction. They came from Kentucky.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So I remember the Union Army was driven in from Baltimore at one time, too.

Mr. DAVIS. And many other places.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly they were; the Senator is right. We were not able to resist the pressure of his friends at all times, I admit.

Mr. DAVIS. If the Senator will allow me, he asked where the mules came from, and he said they came from the confederate lines, or wondered if that was not so. In response to that, without meaning to have said they came inside or outside of the lines, I intended to tell the Senator where they did come from, and he knows as well as I do that Kentucky in 1864 was in possession of the Union Army and so continued almost the entire time.

The facts of the case are these: Wilson contracted with the Government to deliver five or six hundred mules here. When he approached——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I thought I had the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. EDMUND. Of course I do; how can I help it?

Mr. DAVIS. I understood the Senator to say he would yield. However, as I have commenced I will state that the facts are, the mules were driven to the picket lines out near Bladensburgh, and by the pickets, under a general order they were kept there, as has been stated by the Senator from Kentucky, for twenty-four hours. On the following day, while they were retained there, the rebel cavalry came around in some way and drove the mules off. I believe that is the whole story.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator need not have taken all this time to convince me that the mules came from Kentucky. That was stated before, and the zeal of my honorable friend from Kentucky showed that also. We can take it for granted that the mules came from Kentucky. So a good many people in the rebel army, who on that very day were attacking us in Fort Stevens, in July, 1864, came from Kentucky. Kentucky was a State that was about half-way betwixt and between these people. I do not speak of its government. My honorable friend, the Senator from Kentucky, I believe, was governor part of the time, and a more vigorous and honorable warfare than he made against the rebels never was made so far as I have any reason to know.

But, Mr. President, in July, 1864, the very time when this celebrated capture occurred, the rebel army had almost surrounded the city of Washington; you may say it had quite surrounded it on the land side; it was within four miles of the spot where I am now speaking, cannonading the outworks of this city; and now it is proposed because this man on that very day, coming from outside our lines, was delayed by the pickets, when we were in the heat of this extreme stress and discomfort at that time, to say that he has a higher claim than anybody else, and he must be sent to the Court of Claims instead of his case being tried here on its merits. It seems to me to be a very extraordinary proposition; and I say that this bill commits the United States on the face of it to the fact that we are bound to agree to the circumstance that it was through the fault of the United States that the capture was made. What evidence have we of that? Is there no stress of war which will justify the Government of this country in keeping up military lines around this city? And if you do keep them up, are you to say that everybody who chooses to come to Washington to carry out his contracts shall not submit to the overruling military necessities of the occasion, and if he gets captured himself, or his property gets captured, he has a claim upon the Government of this country for reimbursement? That is the question.

I say therefore I am justified in the remark that this bill, on the face of it as it reads, goes beyond anything that has ever been contended for on this floor before by any member of the Senate whose views have been in favor of maintaining the Union and maintaining the Administration that saved it. We have differed as to whether the case of Best and cases of that character fell within a particular principle or fell without it; but no one has ever before proposed to declare what this bill on the face of it declares. It says nothing whatever about a liability on a contract or a right to sue upon a contract; but it declares that in the stress of war, when this city was invested by rebel arms, the property of this citizen being without our lines, and therefore either in the debatable country or in the country of the rebels at the moment, happened to be captured on account of the fact that the stress of war made it impossible for him to get through our lines with his property, he shall be repaid.

So, Mr. President, you may repay everybody through the whole four years of that struggle who, detained in the Southern States or kept outside of our lines by those reasons of military prudence that apply, as we all understand, in such instances, can come here and say, "What you have done for Wilson of Kentucky do for me." You see the effect of bad precedents very readily here. The Senator from Kentucky now stands most eloquently and vigorously upon the Douglas precedent. That may be a bad precedent. The Senator from Pennsylvania entirely distinguishes that case from this. If he is correct, as I have no doubt he is, it is a clear distinction, and the Senator from Kentucky well understands it. He thinks the Senator from Pennsylvania is not correct. But you see the force of precedents, because now the Senator hangs with such vigor on the fact that we have done something like this. Now, suppose you do this, and say you will send to the Court of Claims the claim of a citizen for compensation for mules captured by rebels in 1864 in consequence of military operations. That is what the words "refusal of the pickets" to let him in mean. The army engaged in defending this city had to be a little cautious in respect to what people it let within the lines. Therefore, in consequence of the stress of military operations, it is said he was delayed. Take it that he was; we do not know that; we have had no testimony under oath and no cross-examination of witnesses; we do not know what the case was. The Senator from Kentucky believes it undoubtedly; I am not questioning his beliefs; but we cannot pass bills upon faith which involve consequences like these. We must pass them upon facts.

Mr. SCOTT. If the Senator from Vermont will permit me to correct what perhaps is a misapprehension in his mind, the Douglas case was not for property captured by the enemy, but it was for property taken and used by our own Army upon their plantation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That I perfectly understand. I did not refer to that from the fact that the distinction which the Senator stated as to the circumstances under which they were allowed to go to the Court of Claims was so complete that it was not necessary to occupy the time of the Senate in going over the other ground.

Now, as the Senator suggests on the subject itself, the subject of the Douglas claim was one which if just in its origin fell clearly within the principle of cases wherein we ought to pay, as we all agree. In this case, the bill upon the face of it declares that this is a warlike capture. It refers to the date when this city was invested by the enemy, and it states as a reason for our liability that the stress of military operations compelled us to exclude this man from our lines, he being upon the other side, and so his property was captured; and I say the bill settles that so far; it does not leave it open even for the Court of Claims to judge upon that. But I do not care abont that. I say we never did and we never ought to submit to the Court of Claims any question of that character. If this man is to be paid, let the Senate take the responsibility of declaring that they will pay for property captured outside of our lines by the superior force of the rebel arms. Let us say so; but do not send to the Court of Claims a thing nobody ever thought of sending there before, so far as I know, the clear case of a man demanding pay for property captured by force of war when a city near which he was attempting to enter to perform a contract with the Government was surrounded and invested by the rebel forces. That is this case; and I am surprised that my friend from Kentucky should urge it.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Vermont may justly aspire to be called the Aristides of the Senate if his justice to the Government is to be measured by his persistent opposition to almost every private claim. But if even that Senator knew all the facts in this case I am sure that he would not oppose the passage of this bill.

I deny in toto the proposition of the Senator of Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOTT,] that the mules for which compensation is sought was an ordinary capture by the enemy in war. This claimant seeks damages for the violation of a contract by the Government in preventing him from delivering a number of mules which he had bound himself to deliver for the use of the Army at the city of Washington on a particular day during the war. The Government refused to allow him to enter the city with his mules either upon the day before or the day named in the contract for the delivery of said mules in Washington. He was on the boundary line of the city, in full view of the Capitol, for twenty-four hours before the day of the delivery. He tried to obtain permission to enter the city, but by military authority was prevented from doing so, and was prevented thereby from delivering the mules. It was the direct act of the Government which prevented the delivery. A day after, in front of Washington, the mules were taken by the confederates. The claimant lives in Bourbon County. When he left Kentucky there was no indication or suspicion of an attack upon Washington. So sudden was the demonstration by the confederates upon Washington that President Lincoln, though warned by rumor of their advance, did not believe they would attempt to come to Washington, and refused for several days to take any steps by recalling troops from other points for the defense of the capital. He believed it a device. The battle at the Monocacy alarmed and struck terror into the people of Washington, because of the want of a sufficient force to repel the threatened attack. This claimant left Kentucky without any reason to fear any assault on Washington, nor had he ground to apprehend any encounter whatever with any portion of the Army. It required two or more weeks to drive his mules from Kentucky to Washington City. At the time of his departure there was no enemy between Kentucky and Washington. It was only after Wilson had been for many days on the road with his mules that the confederates determined to make a demonstration upon Washington. He was in advance of them and they in his rear.

He did reach Washington twenty-four hours in advance of the confederates. He notified the War Department that he had reached the outward lines of the city with the mules a day before the period named in the contract for their delivery and he was anxious, ready, and willing to deliver said mules. The military authorities in consequence of the approach of the enemy had issued an order forbidding ingress or egress from Washington. Wilson was refused admittance into the Federal lines with his mules. The confederate army approached and took the mules, but by energy and effort he recovered a portion; the others were never recovered and their value was a total loss. Wilson having been ready to deliver, according to the terms and tenor of his contract, at the place and time, the Government interposed—it matters not for what purpose—and prevented the delivery of the mules. Is Wilson entitled to an action for a breach of his contract with the Government? Able and eminent Senators, who rank as lawyers of pre-eminent ability, deny that the Government is liable in the premises. Why not? It failed to permit and absolutely prevented Wilson from delivering his mules and thereby became liable for any damages sustained by Wilson in consequence thereof.

The claimant Wilson now comes to Congress and asks to be permitted to set up his claim in the Court of Claims with an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. The application is simple. It is just. If Wilson is entitled to nothing he gets nothing, he will get nothing. Why are the Senators from Pennsylvania and from Vermont opposed to this bill? The right of the claimant is purely a judicial question. To what better tribunal could the claim be referred than to the Court of Claims?

What objection can be urged against its passage? The Senator from Pennsylvania says the claim is bad. He denies all liability on the part of the Government. I deny it. Why not allow the Supreme Court, upon an appeal from the Court of Claims, to tell us what the law is? His denial of liability of the Government begs the question. That is the point upon which the claimant desires adjudication. The Senator from Pennsylvania says you shall not sue in the Court of Claims, because the Government owes you nothing.

Mr. President, I was pained to hear the Senator from Pennsylvania, who is the chairman of the committee by which this bill was reported, attempt to excite the Senate by referring to Kentucky as neutral during the war. He was pleased to talk in grandiloquent style about loyalty to the Government. The Senator from Pennsylvania is a good lawyer, and if he is satisfied that is legal position in the construction of this contract Wilson can recover nothing. Why awaken the bitter strife of the war? Why does the Senator seek to defeat this just claim by depriving the claimant of appealing to the judicial tribunals? Why arouse party animosities and sectional feeling? Justice is represented as blind, holding the balance with an even hand, unable to perceive the litigants.

Let this claimant appeal from this forum, where party and passion too often blind and mislead us, to that quiet, calm, judicial tribunal by which justice is sought to be administered without any external disturbing influence.

I hope Senators will lend me their aid in passing this bill.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I had no idea when my friend from West Virginia asked to take up this bill that we were to be precipitated into such a discussion as this; but the appeals which are made by my friend from Kentucky to Senators, the very earnestness of those appeals and the manner of them, warn me that as the chairman of the Committee on Claims I have a duty to perform before the final vote is taken on this bill.

Now, sir, if the Senator from Kentucky will cast his mind's eye back for a short period he will see that there has been no disposition to discriminate against Kentucky claims. It was, perhaps I do not go far wrong in saying, neutral ground for a long period of time. When he remembers that to the one city of Lexington more claims have been awarded, and larger claims than to any other city that I can now call to mind except Nashville, he certainly will agree that there has been no disposition here to discriminate against Kentucky. A literary institution there received $25,000; an agricultural and mechanical association, within the last few days, has had voted to it $25,000 more for the occupation and destruction of its grounds; a bill was passed at the instance of the Senator himself a few days ago to pay a lady in the city of Lexington for the occupation of her property; and now, sir, we are asked to take up a bill, and because the claimant is a citizen of Kentucky we are appealed to upon grounds of sympathy to set a precedent which will return to plague us before very long.

I have said Kentucky was neutral ground. How often was it invaded by the confederate army and how many mules were captured and run off from Kentucky by that confederate army? I wish my friend were in his seat to answer the question.

Mr. STEVENSON. I am here.

Mr. SCOTT. How many mules were captured in Kentucky by the confederate army and run away from their owners during the four years of the war?

Mr. STEVENSON. I cannot tell.

Mr. SCOTT. Hundreds of them, thousands of them perhaps; and now I ask any one who recognizes the rule that a government is not responsible to its citizens for property captured by the superior force of the enemy to point to me the distinction between the claim that will be made for the mules captured on the farms of loyal men in Kentucky and the mules captured outside of the city of Washington when forces led, if I am not mistaken, a part of them, by a distinguished citizen of Kentucky against the Union, were beleaguering the city. Where is the distinction? The Senator says that this citizen of Kentucky was here endeavoring to fulfill his contract with the Government. So he was. Was it the fault of the Government that he did not get his mules here?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. SCOTT. The fault of the Government?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. SCOTT. Surely my friend is not considering the extent of his assertion when he says it was the fault of the Government in issuing an order for the purpose of preventing the entrance here of an enemy that sought to dismantle this capital and destroy this Union. That was what the Government did. It issued an order to prevent access to this capital by those who were seeking the nation's life and were in battle array for the purpose of taking it. Tell me it was the fault of this Government to issue that order which kept that man and his mules out of Washington! If it was, it was the fault of the Government in issuing every order from the 12th of April, 1861, down to the day that the rebel army surrendered in Virginia. It was the exercise of the sovereign power of the Government for the purpose of preserving the nation's life; and the fact that that order prevented this man from coming into Washington gives him no more claim against the Government than the fact that the war was raging would give to every loyal man in the nation for property captured by the enemy.

Within the last few days we have had a discussion in this Chamber and a vote which warns us where we are drifting; and I want to say to the men of the South who have been standing here asking for the payment of loyal citizens of the South, that the course which is now being taken has led many of those who have been the advocates of the payment of loyal citizens to consider seriously whether the point which we have now reached is not the one from which our steps should be retraced in giving payment to loyal citizens of the South, whether the danger which menaces us in the precedent set in this Chamber a few days ago, if followed by passing this bill, is not one which bids fair to bring upon us hundreds of millions of claims as well founded as this one or as the one to which I refer.

Mr. President, I had intended to say very little, I had intended to call the attention of the Senate simply to the facts in this case, to a principle which it involves, and to permit the Senate to vote upon that principle calmly and dispassionately; but the fervent appeals that have been made here by my friend from Kentucky to the sympathies of Senators, appeals to do for this man what he alleges they have done for others—his earnestness in doing all this has led me to say that we have a duty to perform in standing between such claims and the Treasury of the United States; for if we admit this, the torrent which will soon rush in will render opposition vain, vain, sir, to any of the classes of claims which are now hovering around us and seeking for precedents upon which to place themselves.

Mr. STEVENSON. I shall not, Mr. President, imitate the example of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] in fighting over in this Chamber the battles of the late rebellion. If that Senator feels that to defend the passage of this bill recommended by a majority of his own committee it is necessary for him to rekindle the expiring embers of that bloody strife which every patriotic heart should desire to extinguish—if his success demands an appeal to the party passions and sectional prejudices of the dominant majority of the Senate rather than to their judgment and justice, be it so.

Mr. SCOTT. I have awakened no passion.

Mr. STEVENSON. Awakened no passion? Attempted to arouse no bitter sectional animosity against this humble, honest claimant by endeavoring to indirectly rail at the disloyalty of Kentucky!

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) The Senator will address the Chair.

Mr. STEVENSON. I am addressing the Chair. I have a right while debating a bill to turn to the Senator to whom I am replying without entrenching upon any rule of this body.

Mr. SCOTT. The Senator asks me what appeals I made. I believe I stated a historical fact—if I am wrong he will correct me—that in the raid upon Washington in 1864 a portion of the army besieging the capital was led by a distinguished citizen of Kentucky. Am I wrong in that statement?

Mr. STEVENSON. The Senator is not wrong in his historical statement. But why that reference? Cui bono? What matters it to one proper decision of the question before the Senate whether the confederate forces before Washington were led by a Kentuckian or a Marylander? Why this allusion to a brave and gallant Kentuckian, now in private life, who linked his fortunes with the confederate cause and distinguished himself upon many a battle-field, winning the admiration of his foes? Was such a reference pertinent to the merits of the bill? Is not the motive of such allusion transparent? Had it any other object? Did it seek any other end than the defeat of this bill by awakening the animosities of the war and rekindling the prejudices of the past against Kentucky, because brave men in that Commonwealth differed in their views and sought service alike in both the Union and confederate armies?

The Senator from Pennsylvania is pleased also to refer to the property of the United States captured by the confederates in Kentucky during the war. But still he says he is making no sectional appeals. Mr. President, Kentucky sprang from the loins of Virginia; bone of her bone and flesh of her flesh. How natural the sympathy, the affection, the interest of the daughter for the mother in a clash of arms? But while the Senator from Pennsylvania endeavors to arouse sectional passion against my State because many of her sons flocked to the confederate standard, he seems oblivious to the historical fact that thousands and tens of thousands of brave Kentucky hearts, separating themselves from all the ties of section, kindred, and natural sympathy, rallied to the flag of the Union and gave their lives and their fortunes for the unity of these States.

Does the Senator from Pennsylvania forget how many Kentucky soldiers found bloody graves and now sleep in the national cemetery at Gettysburgh? Would he prove his gratitude to their heroism in saving his own Commonwealth from confederate rule by attempting to defeat the right of a Kentucky citizen to go into the Court of Claims to have an adjudication upon his claim against the Government for supplies furnished to the Union in that gigantic struggle? Is there anything unusual in this application? Are not the archives of Congress, the records of the Court of Claims, and of the Supreme Court of the United States full of precedents in support of the privilege granted by the pending bill? Do not Senators personally know that the War Department often and justly refer meritorious claims, barred by time, to the courts for adjudication? Is not such a course just and proper? But this claimant lives in disloyal Kentucky, and however loyal himself, because Kentuckians went into the rebellion, the bill must be rejected!

Mr. President, I am tired and sick of this continued attempt in Congress to defeat just claims by appeals to the passions and prejudices. In God's name, let the dead past bury its dead; let our charity, our justice, our love of country forget the past, and look to the future.

Kentucky needs no defense against assaults from any quarter. Her past history as a State is her highest eulogium. She asks equality and seeks justice for her people. From the bloody fields of the Thames and the Tippecanoe to the city of Mexico, Kentucky soldiers who fell in the honor and defense of their country quietly sleep. If you ask a pension for these old soldiers who live or their widows who survive them, the cry is still made, were they loyal? Widows in Kentucky, whose farms were taken and occupied for years during the rebellion, timber cut and fences destroyed, are denied compensation upon the ipse dixit of a mere quartermaster's clerk that they were disloyal. Thousands of dollars' worth of quartermaster's stores were furnished by the best and worthiest men in Kentucky, taken by the Government, and they are denied compensation because they sympathized with the rebellion.

And now a worthy, upright citizen of Bourbon County, Kentucky, who contracted with the Government of the United States in 1864 to deliver on a certain day named several hundred mules in Washington City for the Army, who fulfilled his contract, and upon the day preceding the day named in the contract for the delivery arrives at Washington with his mules, but is prevented by a military order issued by the Government from entering the city, which subsequently fall into the hands of the enemy, asks Congress to allow him to go into the Court of Claims and assert his right to damages for a breach of contract, and it is sought to defeat him because it is a capture of property pending the war for which the Government is not liable! If the doctrine asserted by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOTT] and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] be law, then the Court of Claims, or the Supreme Court of the United States to which there is an appeal, would so declare, and this claimant would get nothing.

I deny that this claim rests on the doctrine asserted by the Senator from Pennsylvania. It does not stand on the ground of property captured by the enemy.

In contracts for the delivery of personal chattels the Government occupies the same position as a private individual, and is governed by all the rules of construction applicable to them. If the Government contracts for the purchase of personal chattels, to be delivered by the contractor at a place and day named, and the Government by its strong arm prevents the delivery, the contractor is entitled to all the damage which he sustains by the act of the Government. The Senator [Mr. SCOTT] denies the proposition of law asserted by me. I insist upon its correctness. Why not allow the courts to decide it?

Senators, be just, as I know you will be; let not the appeals of the Senator from Pennsylvania to your passions and your prejudices lead you to deny to this worthy and honest Kentucky farmer the privilege of an adjudication upon his rights by the judicial tribunals of his country. He can get nothing without, by the judicial construction of the law, he be entitled to it. Surely you would not deny him what the law accords. He asks nothing more; he should receive nothing less. I ask that this bill may be passed.

Mr. TIPTON. Mr. President, if I can be instrumental in one word in allaying this storm of passion which has swayed the Chamber for the last half-hour, I shall certainly have brought the Senate to a proper frame to contemplate peace and harmony and domestic felicity in the Territory of Utah. [Laughter.] I wish to call attention to the fact that while the Senator from Kentucky has shown a little warmth in regard to the patriotism, as he thinks, of his constituency and his State, on the other hand the Senator from Vermont, as I think, appealed to the prejudice of the country and to that bitterness and asperity which we trusted had been allayed forever. When I saw a general of the Union army on the one side of this Chamber and a general of the confederate army on the other side of this Chamber, I supposed that we had entered upon a reign of peace and amity and comity and friendship, that it would not be considered legitimate debate to make appeals to the passions and references to the bloody past; but the honorable Senator from Vermont seems to think otherwise. When therefore his attention is called to the fact that a Kentuckian has a claim before the Senate, his first reply is, "Why, there were rebels in Kentucky." But the answer is made, "Yes, but he had a contract under seal with the Government of the United States." "Very well," says he in reply to the contract; "did not Kentuckians attack us in the war?" "Yes; but he brought his mules from Maryland." "O, but was not the Union Army attacked in Maryland;" and it is blood and thunder and the Union Army that is to be the omnipotent reply to a contract under seal in the hands of a loyal Kentuckian. I find the prototype of this and of the honorable Senator on this occasion in the history of a distinguished Captain Blakely, of Vermont.

Captain Blakely was at some place in the vicinity of the Chincha Islands engaged in the guano trade, as many another man from the State of Vermont has made his fortune, and many orators have had embellishments from the garlands plucked from the Chincha Islands. Captain Blakely's mate was killed by a celebrated captain who was outlawed on the coast. Captain Blakely arrested the officer who had killed his negro mate, sent out word to all the captains in the port that he wished them at nine o'clock in the morning to come on board his vessel and see him execute the man that had killed his "nigger," as he termed him. "But," said they, "Captain Blakely, has the man been tried?" "Tried!" says he; "certainly not; didn't he kill my nigger?" "Ah, well, but you wouldn't hang him without a trial; how would it sound?" Said he, "Sound be hanged! Didn't he kill the nigger?" [Laughter.] "Of course nobody denies that." "Well, then I am going to hang him anyhow." "O, well, but that would be murder." "Well, then, let us hang him first and try him afterward," says the captain from Vermont. "Well," said they, "but you will have to have him tried or your country may be involved in difficulty." "Yes; but I should reply to them, 'Didn't he kill the nigger?'" Accordingly he yielded to the trial. "How long will it take?" "Only a few minutes." "Very well, then; I will bring the prisoner and bring the rope at the same time. Go on with your trial." After they went through with the trial and found the captain guilty of murder, he took out his old Bible that he had carried down from the State of Vermont with him, and read to the criminal the first two chapters of the book of Genesis. After he had got through reading to him, with the rope around his neck, the first two chapters of the book of Genesis, he turned to him and said: "Now, didn't you kill the nigger?" He got no confession. Said he: "I have done for you more than most men would do; I have read to you the first two chapters of the book of Genesis;" and he swung him off, taking out his watch deliberately and timed him for just thirty minutes, cut him down, and as he was about to hand him over for burial, and gazing upon his prostrate body, finally he showed some emotion, some twinges of conscience, and when all was excitement to understand what was operating upon the heart of the captain, he looked sad and dejected, and said he, "Well, I have just been thinking perhaps I ought to have burned him at the stake, but then I was trying to do for the best." [Laughter.] And here comes the honorable Senator with all the mercilessness of attack on this loyal Kentuckian, slays him here in the Senate house of the nation, and has only compunctions that perhaps he had not done his duty and did not burn him at the stake.
